

The Uruguay Round

developing countries, especially least developed and net food-importing developing countries."

It is also important to note that the Uruguay Round was not limited to agriculture. It included negotiations on trade in services, intellectual property rights, and trade policy issues related to development. The negotiations were complex and contentious, involving many countries and利益 groups. The final outcome was a comprehensive agreement that addressed a wide range of issues, including agriculture, trade in services, intellectual property rights, and trade policy issues related to development.
