

and accordingly come to regard the Church as a monster of iniquity, rather than the fair and beautiful spouse of Christ. When we remember, too, that every tract society, every publishing institution conducted under the auspices of the non-Catholic sects is printing and sending out works in which the Church and her teachings are constantly assailed, the wonder is that we have any converts at all. It is an unfortunate truth that preaching nowadays cuts little figure in real missionary endeavor. Printers' ink is the potent agency through which human intelligence is reached, and when we neglect this agency, we are making a fearful mistake.

Small, but Busy.

In almost every little railroad-station in the United States, you will find a rack placed there by a little religious organization known as the Seventh Day Adventists. These people have practically no standing in the religious world. The chief tenet of their belief is that the Lord ordained that Saturday or the real Sabbath Day should be kept holy rather than the Sunday, and all their energies are directed towards bringing the Christian world back to that observance. They believe and hold that the Catholic Church was instrumental in turning the world away from the traditional Sabbath, and their spleen is accordingly vented in a particular manner against the Church. They issue weekly a little publication known as the Signs of the Times. It is bitterly anti-Catholic and relashes every vile charge
