

There is a splendid lesson in these trials as the statement is sometimes made that more butter can be made at home than at the creamery. If one's aim is to secure the maximum weight regardless of quality there would be little difficulty in satisfying the most critical, but serious trouble would arise when the price was made known, as the quality of the product would not command very much value in the open market. The creamery can serve the farmers best by having quality in the finished product as the main objective. It is the only way the dairy industry can be developed. Education will in time eliminate smaller troubles and influence the producer to give more attention to the important phases of dairying which are too often overlooked.
