After it had done all the damage it could to the Liberal party by clinging to its skirts and making which are embraced in the constitutions of the States are included among the by-laws of Britain and her colonies. by clinging to its skirts and making public confessions of wrong-doing on its behalf it had a right to expect some consideration from the victors—to expect that it would be let down into the Grit camp as gently as possible. In this it was mistaken. It called piteously to its new allies that Mr. Tilley was all that was good and honorable and worthy of all imitation, politically, and must not be abused for its sake. The answer came from its new allies—Tilley is "a-braying ass in a lion's skin," a "great political criminal," etc., etc. It called upon the Grit party, now that Mr. Burpee and it had gone over, to nominate a brother renegade, so that is might support him with seeming decency. The party responded by nominating Mr. Deveber, the old-time opponent of the Telegraph's party, the standard-bearer of Anti mateontents, the very man against whose aspirations for a seat in Parliament the Telegraph thun dered one short year ago. The does was too bitter. The insult was too great. It was not used to such treat:
