The Widow's Son

By Mrs. E. Southworth

"Yes, dear mamma I will. What is that?"

"Some one tapping softly at the door, the stewardess, I suppose," said Mrs. Powis rising and turning to see. It was really Mr. Powis standing outside the door.

"How is our dear girl? Is she ill?" he anxiously inquired.

"Oh, no, she will join you on deck presently. Wait here a moment for me," said Mrs. Powis. And she gently closed the door and spoke to Lily May.

"My dear, I will send you some breakfast and afterward you will find us on deck."

Then she went out to her husband took his arm, and passed on. Seeing the stewardess she directed her to send some tea and toast into Mrs. Powis' room.

When they reached the upper deck they walked on to their favorite spot—the space behind the wheelhouse—and there they sat down to talk.

"What delayed our daughter this morning?" inquired Mr. Powis.

"Arthur, I told you Lily May was not ill. And neither is she, in body."

"Arthur, I told you Lily May was not ill. And neither is she, in body."

"What then?"

"She is ill in mind. She is struggling with a great sorrow that is seriously affecting her nerves—perhaps her brain."

"Gladys, you alarm me."

"I am myself alarmed. She has made me her confidante. She is pining and dying for the friends who have left behind. She dreams and sees visions of her home and her friends all night, and broods over her separation from them all day, and her dreams are so lifelike, and her realities so dreamlike, that she confesses she scarcely knows one from the other. Such a state is morbid and dangerous. I fear the deadly drugs that were administered to me before her birth have so seriously impressed her constitution as to render her peculiarly liable to morbid conditions."

"Heaven forbid! But do you think that the loss of those friends whom she voluntarily left is the only cause of her sorrow?"

"Yes, I do, or rather the loss of the one friend in whom her life seems to be bound up."

"Tell me all about it, Gladys."

Mrs. Powis gave him the details of her interview with Lily May.

"What can we do about it?" inquired Mr. Powis, in perplexity.

"Do what I have promised in your name and my own. Take her to New York in the first steamer that leaves after our landing. You see how she looks. And as for me, I believe the course I propose is the only means of saving her life."

"But dear Gladys, when we get there, how then? We cannot, of course give up our daughter to the charge of her late guardian."

"No, but we can give her the opportunity of free association with her friends who appear to be very worthy people. Then, gradually and tenderly we can separate them."

Lily May is not strong enough to bear a sudden and final wrench. Now, then Arthur, you will consent to take her back to New York?"

"Yes, I see no objection to that. Indeed, our object in going to Europe (to look up our next of kin) is forestalled by the discovery of our daughter. We have nothing particular to take us or keep us there."

While he spoke the pretty head of Lily May appeared at the top of the steep stairs, and he at once started up and ran to assist her to get on deck.

"It is all right, my dear. Your father has consented and we are all to go back by the first steamer that sails after our arrival," said Mrs. Powis, making room for her daughter on the rug.

Lily May lifted up her face to kiss her father in acknowledgment of his kindness, and after he had pressed his lips to hers she sat down beside her mother. And the bright autumn day on the mid-ocean passed very cheerfully with the little family group.

In the dead of the night that followed this day all the passengers on board the steamer were suddenly aroused from their sleep, not by any violent shock and noise, but by the sudden cessation of all motion and sound.

Each passenger started up out of bed in more or less trepidation, and listened in more or less anxiety, in the expectation of soon hearing a mighty rushing to and fro of officers and crew with the announcement of some awful disaster. But as everything remained quiet, each passenger composed himself or herself to sleep again and slept as well as they could while missing the usual terrific noise of machinery with which the ocean steamers lull their children to sleep.

In the morning a fog white as milk obliterated all the boundaries of sea and sky. And the steamer was still motionless. The passengers assembled on the upper deck to find out the cause of the stoppage. The general opinion was that the steamer had run aground on a sand bar. But when the truth came to be known it was this:

There was something wrong with the machinery which the engineer could set right in a few minutes, or hours or days at most.

It proved to be days. For all that day they remained stationary while an incessant sound of rapsin hammering and tinkering went on. And the fog continued to brood over them. And on the third day passed in the same manner. It was all that Mr. and Mrs. Powis could do to restrain the impatience of their homesick child, to whom this indefinite delay was very trying.

On the night of the third day a steamer passed them so near that they could hear the sound of her paddle-wheels. In the morning the fog had cleared away, and the steamer that had passed them in the night was seen far away to the eastward.

The passengers on the deck took out their telescopes to look at her. Mr. Powis took out his glass—a very fine one purchased from the manufacturer in London. Mrs. Powis and her daughter stood near him.

If they could but have known that Owen was at that moment levelling his telescope at their own steamer.

"What is it, Arthur, dear?" inquired Gladys.

"It is the steamship that passed us in the fog last night. She must be the one that sailed from Boston last Wednesday—the Prussia, if I am not mistaken in the name."

Even as he spoke the Prussia dropped down below the eastern horizon, setting as the sun arose.

At this moment a cry of exultation came up from below, as their own steamer began once more to breathe, to pant, and to move on the water.

"We are off."

"We are off."

Was the cry that was taken up and echoed and re-echoed through the ship.

They were off indeed, flying eastward at the rate of twelve miles an hour.

The remainder of the voyage was very prosperous, and in due time they anchored in the Cove of Cork.

While Lily May stood by her mother's side, enraptured with her first view of that most beautiful harbor, her father formed one of a group of gentlemen who were talking with some visitors who had come off from Queenstown to ask and tell the news.

Presently Mr. Powis came back to his wife and daughter.

"My dear Gladys, it was the Prussia that passed us. She got here yesterday, and has gone up to Liver pool. To think that she should have sailed four days after us and got into port one day before us," said Arthur.

"On account of that stoppage. It is too bad."

There was but a short delay in the Cove of Cork, and then the Belgia put about and sailed up the channel to the mouth of the Mersey and thence up to Liverpool, where they arrived late at night.

DIETRICH'S BREAD IS GREAT

There are few places, anywhere, in which food is prepared, that are as clean, or in which the food itself is kept as clean as in Dietrich's Bread Bakery. The flour is sifted, the dough tubs are sweet, the tables and machines are kept in perfect sanitary condition; and the loaves are touched by hand only a few times in the whole process. If you buy Dietrich's Bread, you get it fresh, direct from the bakery, and you get it clean. It is your best and cheapest food. Eat more of it.
