Last Night With 49.

a Foiled Villain.

Jauquin Millers' melodrama, "Forty-Nine" opened at the Standard last evening to a full house, and a house containing very little "paper" at that.

The management, as was stated in yesterday's Nugget, propose to inaugurate a new departure in theatrical work in Dawson by putting on clean family (Thursday) in each week to the reception of ladies and families

"Forty-Nine" is one of those plays, the scene of which, as is passably well indicated by the title, is laid in California, in the "days of gold," and of course represents mining camp life. The first scene shows an eastern home, and introduces the hero, a prodigal son, the villain, who was born a gentleman, made him a scoundrel. When the cur- without exploding. tain goes up he has reached the age when he is a gambler by occupation and a villain by necesity. The prodigal's Parkes' moving pictures. mother appears in this scene and again in the last, and is enveloped in widow's weeds and tears on both occasions. Attorney White, who never made a mistake or lost a case in his life, and is the friend of the family and the employe of Charley, the prodigal, who sends the latter to California in search of an heiress, whose parents were killed in the Mountain Meadow massacre.

The villain overhears the talk about the beiress, steals the papers of identification from the prodigal, goes to California and marries the wrong woman. Charley goes to California without the papers, finds the heiress and also his father supposed to be dead long before.

In the end the villain, like all good villains who knows his business, is discomfitted and leaves with a curse for all and a few to spare. The long separated husband and wife are reunited and all live happy forever after.
