"He must be near death," says Letitis.

"John," cries aduly, with aduden pas-sion flinging hersell into his arms, "I will not go. No, not one step. What is he to me, that stern old tyrant, who has re-fused for nineteen years to acknowledge me? While you, my dear, my darling, are my all!"

"Nonsense, child!" Speaking roughly, although consoled and strengthened by her cares and loving words. "It is what I have been wishing for all these years. Of course you must go. It is only right you should be recognized by your relations, even though it is so late in the day. Perhaps he will leave you a legacy and"—smilling—"I think I may console myself with the reflection that old Amherst will scarcely be able to cut me $\frac{1}{2}$ are my all!"

"I shant'stay any time," says Molly, reviving. "I shant'stay any time," says Molly, reviving. "I shall be back before you realize the fact that I have gone. I know in polite society no one is expected to outstay a month at the very longest."

"You cover me with confusion," says Luttrell, laughing. "Consider what unmentionable form I have displayed. How long have I outstayed my time? It is uncommonly good of you, Mrs. Massareene, not to have given me my conge long ago; but my only excuse is that I have been so utterly happy. Perhaps you will forgive me when you learn that I must tear myself away on Thursday."

"Oh! must you?" says Letitia, honeetly sorry. "Thank you, old boy," says Luttrell. "Come out," whispers Molly, slipping her hand into her lover's (she minds John and Letitia about as much as ahe minds the tables and chairs); "the rain has ceased, and see what a beautiful sun. I have any amount of things to say to you, and a whole volume of questions to sak about my detested grandpers. So freehen your wis. But first before we go"—mischieviously, and with a little nod full of reproot—"I really think you ought to spologise to John for your scandalous behavior of this morning."

"Molly, I predict this glorious future for you," says her brother: "that you will be returned to me from Herst Royal in disgrace."

When they have reached the summer house in the garden, whither they have wended their way, with a view to shade (as the sun having been debarred from his first experience with a fishing rod: "What, back so soon?" Walterd my shon, boding it out to Molly, says, somewhat shamefacedly, "Here is something for you."

"Oh, Teddy! it cannot be for me," she says, with a little gasp that speaks solumes; "it is too beautiful. Oh, how good of you to think of it! And how did you know that if there is one thing on earth which I love is a ring? And such a ring! You wicked boy, I do believe you have spent a fortune on it." Yet in reality she hardly guesses the full amount of the generous sum that has been so willingly expended on that glittering hop.

A man takes pride in saying he has a mind of his own, and yet when he gets "I am glad you like it," he says, radiant hoop.

A man takes price in asying he has a mind of his own, and yet when he gots angry he takes pleasure in giving some-body else a piece of it.

"Pretty' is a poor word. It is far too handsome. I would soold you for your extravagance, but I have lost the power just now. And do you know—raising her soft, flushed face to her lover—I never had a ring before in my life, except a very old-fashioned one of my mother's, an ancient square, you know, with hair in the centre, and all around it big pearls, that are anything but pearly now, as they have grown quite black. Thank you a thousand times."

She slips her arm around his neck and presses her lips warmly, unbashfully to his cheek. Be it ever so cold, so wanting in the shyness that belongs to conscious tenderness, it is still the very first carees she has ever given him of her own accord. A little thrill runs through him, and a seed leaving to each be, in his street.

is noticeable, too, that he does not even place the ring on her engaged finger, as most men would have done. It is a bauble meant to gratify her: why make it a fotter, be it ever so light a one?

"I am amply repaid," he says, gently. "Was there ever such luck as your getting that it is in the propriet." New Goods.
