Elections Are Old.

There is very little doubt that there will be a general election this year. It will be an unique election as far as this country is concerned, for it will be the first election in Gt. Britain in which all the elections will be held on one day.

The origin of elections is lost in history, though the earlier one goes back in most countries, the more one finds that only certain very privileged classes had the right to vote. In England, for example before 1832 no one could vote who did not own a certain amount of land or lived in an expensive house.

Some of the earliest known records of elections are those of ancient Greece. An account has been preserved of voters being bribed, not singly but in batches of ten at a time, as long ago as 400 B.C., over two thousand years ago.

These ancient elections rather remind one of the war, for if the Greeks didn't like a politician, they "shelled" him out of his constituency in this way: When two politicians put up to represent a city, the Greeks voted, not which one should be elected, but which one should be banished from the precincts of the city for a certain number of years, usually ten.

Each Greek elector placed in a large metal urn a small shell upon which he had written the name of the man whom he wanted banished. The man who received the least votes was allowed to remain.

A Famous Irish Relic.

(From the London Times.)

Many curious objects have found their way to Christie's, but among the strangest vicissitudes of fortune in its records is surely that of the "Clog an air" (bell of gold) being offered for sale at that famous mart—a renowned relic which for centuries have been venerated by the peasantry of the west of Ireland. From time immemorial the bell has been in the possession of a County Clare family, the O'Canahans, now represented by Mr. Marcus Keane, of Bechpark and Dunelish. According to tradition, it descended from heaven, ringing loudly to St. Sennen, the patron of the Seven Church of Scatteray, a holy island near the mouth of the river Shannon, opposite Killrush, in the earliest years of Christianity in Ireland. Hence it was originally known as "Clog na neal" or bell of the clouds. But the antiquaries are agreed that it is the work of human hands, not angelic, and from its decorations they date it from the eleventh century. The bell is known to have been used for a long period of time in the religious services at Scatteray (now a place of ecclesiastical remains of great antiquity). Before it was given into the care of the O'Canahans, the ancient protectors of the island. It attained to an extraordinary degree of fame and sanctity throughout Clare and Galway. No oath was held to be so sacred as one sworn on the Golden Bell. It was believed that anyone who told a lie after being sworn on the bell, would have his mouth twisted on one side; and down to about the middle of the nineteenth century it was used successfully for the discovery of information when all other means failed. On one occasion a pair of saddlebags containing £340 in gold were stolen. Search and inquiries by the police were all to no purpose. At length the priest announced that he would have the bell at the chapel on the following Sunday to swear all his flock upon it. On the Saturday night a man came to the priest's house and said, "Father Golden Bell, here's the money, every bit of it, all safe and sound." Latterly the owner has refused to lend the bell for such purposes, as he did not wish to encourage this curious superstition. The relic is in the form of a shrine which probable once contained a bell and clapper, it is made of bronze and silver, and is decorated with the figures of two winged dragons and quaint serpent interlacings.

The New Slogan.

It has been a common thing in the past for the politicians who work the strings to set up their catch cries on high wherewith to catch the simple and wayward elector. It was "Bond's day is done," or "Let Morris finish his work," or "Morris must go for Coaker's sake so," just according to the particular fancy in styles of politicians. Methinks there is growing a change in the atmosphere, and the political barometer which at one time was "Set fair" for the present aggregation so-called the National Government, is pointing to "Stormy." Furthermore the people are tired of hearing the merits of particular politicians drummed into their ears and the cry at next election, no matter how far removed, for distance only lends enchantment to the view, will be "Coaker (and the rest) must go for the PEOPLE say so."—Twillingate Sun.
