Chapter VI.
"Been trying to victimize you?" he asks, with his sneering smile. "Dear me! I think I rescued you only just in time—eh, Dallas? A few days more like yesterday—he, he, he!—would have landed you across the Atlantic! The adulation and the adoration and all the rest of it—eh, Dallas? Your hard heart would have softened at last! He, he, he! Joyce Murray ought to thank me; but I suppose she won't. A saucy, charming little witch she is! Eh, Dallas? The prettiest girl I know. I always say, and the gayest and pleasantest—isn't she?"

"She is," Dallas agrees briefly, rather wondering at Glynn's warm praise of a girl who frankly detests the amiable and philanthropic viscount, and scarcely troubles to conceal that she does.

"Ay, fair enough and sweet enough and bewitching enough for any man on earth!" Dallas mutters to himself, with a smothered sigh and a clouded brow. "But not for me, never for me, my pretty fair-haired little Joyce! For I will never marry you to drag you down into poverty and obscurity, even if you are willing to be dragged down by me—and I don't believe you are!" he says, with a bitter laugh as he stands by the vessel's side, looking at the paddles churning the water. "You are a shrewd little woman of the world, young and charming as you are—shrewd and practical and worldly-wise—and you've learned your lady-mother's lessons very well, Joyce. But, if I had money, or you had money—had that girl, Yolande Dörmer's, fortune," he thinks, with an envious, hopeless sigh—"we should be as happy and well matched a pair, I believe, as ever ran in double harness. Well, well, 'things go contrary,' as Mrs. Gumidge says!"

Then his thoughts involuntarily rush backward from England and Pen-treath, and the autumn circle of guests, and Joyce Murray's expected presence among them—back to the lonely girl whose yearning spirit is following each mile of his homeward journey.

She is just at this minute straining her eyes to catch a last glimpse of the steam packet disappearing on the cloudy horizon; and, as the gases, her sorrowful, faithful young soul sends one passionate ejaculatory prayer after him.

"Heaven bless him, and bring him once more to me!"

"I suppose that foolish little mortal came down to the pier, too, to see the last of me," Captain Glynn's soliloquies, with a slight, disdainful smile. "I didn't see her, certainly; but that double-faced English-Frenchwoman of a governess was there as large as life, and of course her pupil was with her. A nice teacher for her mind and morals that poor, simple, ignorant child has!"

Then a slight feeling of remorse creeps over him when he recalls the "foolish little mortal's" evident admiration and liking for himself and his society.

A slight pang of something like regret runs through his heart as he thinks of her, gone back to the dull "respectable" monotony of her life in a middle-class home with two elderly relatives, with nothing but a round of simple, routine duties to fill her lonely, companionless days, varied only by the primly "proper" slow-coach sort of amusement which dull, "respectable" middle-class folk term "pleasure"—a day at the Crystal Palace, and a day when they go to dine at Aunt Sarjent's house, varied by a day at the Agricultural Hall or the Zoo, and a day when Aunt Sarjent comes to dine with them.

"Poor child!" Dallas says, with real compassion, as he shudders at the thought of such an existence as she artlessly and pleasantly told him of yesterday while they walked together down the valley by the mill stream. "Poor little girl! I hope I haven't done anything to fret or disturb her mind. She is an innocent, trustful little soul, I believe, and I'm afraid she will credit every word I said to her. Poor child! I might at least have been honest with her."

And now Yolande has left to her only the memories of this pleasant, never-to-be-forgotten visit to Paris and Brussels—"to the Continent," as her Uncle Elias says, grandly—their stay at the Hotel Morval on their way home, the quiet evening walks through the narrow, paved streets and, on the old pier, and the pleasurable rambles through the ancient Hauteville, and on the wooded, grassy ramparts, and the stolen visits to the old cathedral in the twilight, with its glistening tapers and the faint incense odors stealing through the shadowy aisles.

And pleasantest, best, and brightest memory of all is that of the golden afternoon in the Valley de Nague, of that lonely, lovely walk by the mill stream, through the purple blossoms of the wild mint and the yellow autumn leaves drifting about at their feet; and then the evening drive home, by the road above the cliffs, with the cool sea breeze, blowing in from the channel and the pleasant sea smell of the weed-grown beach just left by the outgoing tide; then the dance and supper later on, and, latest of all, Captain Glynn's taking her down from the hot, brilliantly lighted salon to the cool, quiet entrance hall to say "good-by."

CHAPTER VII.

Yolande is thinking of the happy past as, a week later, she walks up and down the garden paths at home. This beautiful, strange dream of a day's supreme happiness—how unreal it all seems!

They are all settled once more at home to Fair View—though why the place is called Fair View it would be difficult to say, for there is no view whatever from the windows, "except that of a flat field bordered by a thick belt of fir trees—which hedge it from the high road."

Cousin Wilmot and Aunt Sarjent are to dine with them this evening; and Yolande shrinks from the thought with a restless feeling of discomfort and apprehension.

Mrs. Sarjent, who is really not an aunt, but a cousin, and only so termed from motives of convenience and politeness, is the widow of the jam and pickle maker. She is a big, comical, blowy woman of about fifty-four, a person from whom one naturally draws back for she tramples on one's pet corns and one's pet prejudices alike, and then laughs when her victims writhe. She is vulgar, Mrs. Sarjent's friends admit; but she is "a good-hearted creature"—that is to say, possessing plenty of money and robust health, Mrs. Sarjent has the good temper and high spirits of a well-fed, comfortable, pampered animal.

Yolande blushes to think how ashamed she will be if Aunt Sarjent appears this evening before mademoiselle in her peony satin, trimmed with yards upon yards of white, imitation lace, and enough old-fashioned, well-polished gold ornaments about her to stock a small shop. Mademoiselle Gantier is a young lady of most aesthetic tastes—at least, so she declares—and is most unsparring in her criticisms of "bad style" and "bad form." She is just becoming a general incubus on the lives of her employers; but they never dream of questioning her authority or resenting her interference.

She is coming along the espaliered walk now, and Yolande hurries to meet her in some trepidation, fearing that mademoiselle is not in the best of tempers.

That accomplished young woman's brow is austere, not to say frowning, and her tones are full of unconcealed impatience. She finds it enhances her value not to be too agreeable.

Tobacco's Effect Tested.

MEDICAL MEN FIND THAT SMOKING AIDS DIGESTION.

That smoking may be regarded as an aid to digestion was indicated by Dr. J. W. Crane in an address delivered recently to a western union. Dr. Crane said that he had at one time advised his students not to use tobacco, believing it weakened digestion, but tests had shown that the saliva of a smoker digested starch better than that of the non-smoker. Starch is a constituent of many foods.

From another point of view Sir James Cantile, the renowned British medical authority, also regards tobacco as an aid to digestion. Tobacco," says Sir James, has its good effects in digestion, in lessening the effects of worry."
