A MAGNIFICENT SHOW. The County Fair" at the Grand—Splendid Realism—The Young Liberals at Work—A Great Performance.

If the theater-going public had been fully aware of the merits of "The County Fair" the Grand Opera House last night would have been crowded. The audience, however, aware of the merits of "The County Fair" the Grand Opera House last night would have been crowded. The audience, however, was very fair, and as the performance will be repeated this afternoon and to-night all will have an opportunity of enjoying an attraction which has rivaled "The Old Homestead" in New York and the East. "The County Fair" is a representation of honely New England farm life. The characters are drawn with exquisite fidelity to nature. The chief charm of the play is its simplicity. It is a beautiful picture, and its scenes are touchingly true and sweet. The pleasure derivable from "The County Fair" is as abundant as it is pure, and the audience evidently relished the wholesome flavor, for it was a very enthusiastic one, and applauded long, loud and often. "The County Fair" is also notable for its stage effects, all the scenery and mechanical appliances on the stage belonging to the company. The development of the plot by which "Cold Molasses," the 4-year-old celt of the mistress of the farm, is to win the race at the county fair and then save the old homestead from the clutches of a pitiless mortgagee, affords a scene that for startling realism is a masterpiece. The three competing horses—real live animals—are seen running with all the speed of the home stretch, and as "Cold Molasses" forges ahead, many in the house cheered excitedly, so realistic did it appear. An immense amount of machinery is used in the production of this scene. The representation of an old-fashioned husking bee was a very pretty rural picture, enhanced by selections from a fine male quartet. The company is thoroughly computent. Miss Josephine Crowell, who takes the central part, that of prim, prudish and practical Abigail Pruo, is superb, while little Olie Redpath is a gem. Those who miss "The County Fair" miss an attraction that London is seldom favored with.

The Young Liberal Minstrels continue on the journey to the highest stage of efficiency, and will reach it on Tucaday evening, May 17. The Grand Opera House is going t
