mainly on economic questions. And any kind of a solution, or remedy, is likely to be centralizing. The nature of modern economic management tends to bring power to central Governments.

Don't you get into a contradiction, here, between the need to improve economic performance with stronger Federal leadership and, at the same time, the loosening of the Provincial relationships that you feel, yourself, you are required to pursue for these political reasons.

MINISTER LALONDE: I would say "No" to that, because -- I think you are raising a very serious problem, indeed -- but I don't reach the conclusion as you formulated it in the first part of your statement.

I will agree with you on your second part-when you are talking about Federal leadership--but Federal leadership does not necessarily mean political powers--or legal powers.

I think one of our problems has been, too often, to confuse leadership with the exercise of legal powers, as such. I have seen that in my own previous areas-in the area of Health and Welfare-- where the Federal Government legislated very actively in the Sixties and in the Fifties; and we had a lot of programs where we were putting money in-with "conditions" and all of that.

Well, we have been relaxing those "conditions"
