Open Windows and Adenoids. Medical Record. Commenting on the increased preval-ence of adenoids, J. Louis Wallace con-tributes to a recent issue of The Lancet some new ideas as to the etiology of this affection. He notes that it is difficult to find evidence of many ceses indicating the previous existence of adenoids among people of 40 years of age and upwards. whereas it seems to be comparatively rare to find a family of children without at least one of its members having suf-fered from the disease He took a census in a number of families whose habits he knew with regard to keeping the win-dows open in the sleeping rooms of their knew with regard to keeping the win-dows open in the sleeping rooms of their children's He found that of those who kept the windows shut at night there were five families having 26 children in all, and not one of these 26 children, had ever suffered from adenoids. While of five families, having 19 children in all, who kept open windows at night thruout the year, eight of these children had suf-fered from adenoids sufficiently badly to have required operation. The writer is not disposed to lay too much emphasis on the showing of this particular census, but feels that a more complete knowledge on this possible effect of open windows on the growth of adenoids is worthy of further study. He seems, however, to be an adherent to the ancient opinion that the night air has a peculiar deleterious and fisheries. Sir Mackenzie Bowell suggested that they were not otherwise in use.
