A Long Drawn Out Battle,
Score Three to Three

Giants Get Big Lead in the Opening Inning, but Huggins' Men Creep Up—The Largest Attendance Ever
at a World Series Game.

New York, Oct. 5.—World series baseball, that unlucky scion of Trouble and Gold, stepped in front of another young tornado today that came near leading to a wreck. The Giants and Yankees, fighting out their second battle, had just closed out the tenth inning with the score knotted at 3 and 3. The minute hand on the big clock in centre field was pointing twenty minutes to 5. There was a haze over the diamond, but the sky above was cloudless. At this moment the two senior umpires, George Hildebrand and William J. Klein, ordered the announcement made that the game was called on account of darkness.

For perhaps a second or two the big crowd of 37,000 fans sat stunned, and then from almost every nook in the grounds, from grand stand to bleachers, a terrific roar of protest swept back and forth across the field, followed by the prolonged "boo" of the raspberry chorus working at full blast.

Much indignation. In the excitement that followed hundreds of indignant fans swept around Judge Kennesaw Mountain Landis, while thousands of others began to pour a fusillade of burning words against the club owners, who had no more to do with the decision than Babe Ruth or Kenel Pasha.

The two umpires gave their decision courageously and honestly with no other hope of reward beyond an extra day's work without any extra emolument for the trouble they were taking on. The light was falling slowly, but in our opinion another inning could have been played without any trouble.

Nearly Three Hours Long.

The game was as slow as frozen molasses at a Badin Bay breakfast, but for the greater part of the route it carried its full share of quivering drama, sensational fielding, hard hitting and game, skillful pitching where a hit meant disaster.

Shawkey and Barnes, under heavy tension, pitched with cool, deliberate courage that at times was entirely too deliberate as the game dragged along through two hours and forty minutes of play. Shawkey, after a stunning blow from Irish Meusel in the first inning, rose to brilliant heights after the second inning when he checked the Giants with three widely scattered blows over the remainder of the way. But that one blow from Irish Meusel came near wrecking Shawkey beyond all repair.

The First Home. Groh and Frisch had just nicked the Yankee star for two clean hits when Meusel came up waving a big war club in the golden air. The ball left Shawkey's right hand at a good speed, but it left Meusel's bat at even greater pace, sailing into the left field seats for a clean home run. This prodigious punch scored three men and left the Yankee contingent along Rooter's Row gasping for air in the blistering heat that beat upon the scene. Meusel, only the day before, had driven over the winning run with Joe Bush in the way, and once again it looked as if his mighty pass had decided the issue of battle beyond any lingering doubt.

But the Yankees proved they could come from behind as well as the Giants. Shawkey, after slipping a triple in the second round, began to pump increasing speed over the plate as he stopped the Giants in their tracks, held completely under the deadly spell of his speed, curves and control that sought out the corners and kept Giant bats poking away in vain for the rest of the day.

Details of the pitching analysis show that Barnes pitched fifty-seven balls and thirty-seven strikes, while Shawkey twirled fifty balls and shot over thirty-two strikes. Twenty-two foul strikes were knocked off Shawkey's delivery and twelve off the Giant mountaineer.

The Yankees' outfield gathered in seven flies to but three for the Giant defensive workers, while seventeen infield outs were credited to the Yankees and twenty-one to the Giants.

It was just the day for a pitchers' battle, hot and sultry as mid-summer. Biggest Gate in History.

The crowd was bigger than on any day during the 1921 series, and the money paid to sit in on today's session—$122,554—was the highest sum ever deposited into baseball's coffers for one game.

GAME BY INNINGS.

Three Runs in First. First inning Giants—San Jones and Carl Mays went down into the bullpen to get into condition in case they should be called upon. Bancroft up.
