tions and infidel theories. Some years ago, in a book I published, containing answers to the notorious and infidel Estire creation within siz days. There is this further proof of the utter futilsays and Reviews in answering the one by Mr. C. W. Goodwin, I gave some strictures and remarks, which are directly applicable to the material parts of the report of Mr. Paisley's ed long space of time between the creating spread them on a board in the sunshine; they lecture. Indeed, I think it quite probable, that the lecture was, at least, in part composed from Mr. Goodwin's Essay "On the Mosiac Cosmogony," or some other, or others, of the like character. Mr. G. described this globe, before its present arranged form and order, as having been for a vast incalculable period, in the state of an intensely heated and fiery ball, relvoving on its own axis; and that after it settled down and cooled, its interior became composed of different lavers ; and the earth gradually, but he could not tell when or how took its present form. Mr. Paisley according to the report says, that the earth before its regulary arranged form was a " molten mass ;" and that the various stratas, or layers, now formed below its surface, were successively and gradually formed. This molten mass, entirely agrees with Mr. Goodwin's intensely heated fiery ball of jectures of Mr. Goodwin and his youthful felincalculable age. But neither he, nor Mr.

Paisley, nor any one else, knows when or how the fiery ball or molten mass, became cooled and hardened, nor do, or can they say, how conciled; and no person of piety and ordinary long the several layers were in the process of sense, will hesitate as to which is most worth tormation. Some of the remarks in my review of belief. I cannot but think, that if Mr. Pais of Mr. Goodwin's production, are so directly applicable to the one by Mr. Paisley, that, to will lead him to see his error, and that the ave time and trouble, I will here transcribe them, almost verbatim :

As to the various and discordant theories and opinions of Geologists, whether of religious creeds, or ot no creed whatever, they are all entirely worthless, on every point, where they conflict with the plain announcements of Sacred Revelation. Every person who believes in the Divine spirit of infallible truth will implicitly its teachings, on these and all other points; and give no credence whatever to the theories (f sp culative Geologists, presumpto ous y pres m ug to be wise above and beyond dly revealed; and even, on ma-
