and brain fever set in. My father arrived, and from my ravings gathered the terrible story of my desertion by Stanley, as he called himself.

"I shall never know how it all came about, perhaps, Violet, for it was a mystery from beginning to end; but while I lay on my sick-bed, ill unto death, my poor father was found lifeless in a vile house in the city—murdered, with a knife thrust in his heart. No evidence was produced to prove the murder, and on the next day he lies in an unburied grave—my poor, poor father, who was so fond of his little Lena.

"But, Violet, I have never doubted how my father came to his death. He was so reckless on the track of my betray er. He found him, and in an altercation was murdered by the man

I afterward found was Harold Castello, a fast young man of Chicago. But I could not bring home his guilt to him, although I have been on his track ever since my recovery. But now all is different, dear, for you saw him commit the murder. You can help me to bring it home to him."

CHAPTER XXXII

Violet had been sobbing softly at the recital of her friend's sorrows, but now she lifted her fair head, and dabbing the tears from her eyes, answered, tenderly,

"I will tell you the whole harrowing story, Lena, for I was indeed the horrid witness of your poor father's death, and the memory of that scene will never leave me while life lasts!"

Lena pressed her old little hand and waited anxiously for her to begin.

"I must tell you first how I came to be in Chicago at that time," said Violet. "You see, I was at boarding school, and last June our lady principal and her senior class formed a party to attend the World's Fair together for a stay of ten days or so. I wrote to grandpa, and he readily gave his consent to the plan and enclosed me a generous check for expenses. On the first of June our party, consisting of Mrs. Maynard, our teacher, and ten young girls, arrived in Chicago, full of joyous anticipation over the wonderful sights we were to see.

"As you have been to the fair yourself, my dear Lena, I need not dwell on its glories, but only remind you that among the hurrying throngs that filled the immense palace on every hand, it was utterly impossible for such a large party to keep close together. Mrs. Maynard realized this the first day, and directed her young separated from each other, we should all meet her at the closing hour at the Virginia Building, in order to go home together. We found this plan worked nicely, affording each a better opportunity to inspect the buildings that appeared most strongly to one individual taste.

"On the sixth day of our attendance at the Fair we separated into parties. Mrs. Maynard and three girls decided to spend that day at the Woman's Building, two girls went to the Midway Plaisance, two more to the Electric Building, and two more to the Building of Liberal Arts and Manufactures. I found myself alone in the eager desire for a whole day in the magnificent Art Gallery.

"There seemed no possible harm in leaving me there alone, and Mrs. Maynard consented to my wish, saying,

"I can trust you, Violet, to meet me at the Virginia State Building at six o'clock."

"Surely," I replied, and the me and turned away with the throng into the Women's Building, where I was rightly on the steps of the magnificent Art Palace, thrilling with anticipations of the pleasures in store for me in the contemplation of the wonders of art. Scouring a catalogue at the door, I plunged into the eddying throng that filled the rooms, and gave myself up to the keenest delight.

"The hours passed like minutes, and I never even remembered the hundred hour in the hour of pleasure and statuary spread before my appreciative eyes. Oh, how sorry I was that I should have but the one day for viewing all the wonders of this building!

"But you have seen and enjoyed the Art Palace, Lena, so let me hurry on," cried Violet, as she continued:

"Quite late in the afternoon, I ob-
