"Yes," he said savagely, "you looked like this! You would give me lie upon lie, woman-like!—the fiend made you all alike! And I, blind fool that I must be, would believe you if I had not stood beside you on that cursed night, and seen and heard your treachery. You cannot deny it! You played me false—you, with your innocent face and child-like smile. Tell me!—am I mad, or did I see you two together there in the wood?"

In his passion he made a step toward her, his eyes flercely blazing into hers, his hand upheld.

But she did not flinch, neither by lock nor movement. Pale and proud she stood, and her lips opened to hurl back the accusation; but suddenly she remembered—remembered that the man who, stand hefore her was and the looked at her, and his eyes sought hers with a tender wist-unless.

Marjorie did not break into a passion of tears.

She heard the sound of his horse's hoofs growing less distinct each moment—knew that she had let him go when a word might have held him; knew that she had let him go when a word might have held him; knew that she had let him go when a word might have held him; knew that she had let him go when a word might have held him; knew that he had said his last farewell, and that by her slience she had relinquished him to her rival. But she could not weep.

She simply leaned upon the gate and looked at the stars twinkling faintly in the sky, and listened with the benumbed sense of some swiftly vanished delight to the nightingale that poured out its plaintive song above her head. How long she stood communing with the echo of fierce despairing voice, calling up the memory of his pale, haggard face, she did not know.

A step behind her roused her; a voice said at her side:

"Is that you, Miss Deane?"

She turned, with a faint smile. It was Mr. Cumming, the viear.

"I wondered who it could be," he said, and his voice betrayed his pleasure at the recognition. "What are you doing? Star-gazing?"

"Yes," she answered, with a smile of self-mockery, "I am star-gazing?"

and she thought of the star that had fallen from her view forever.

Something in her voice struck upon his ear, which had grown sensitive to her every tone.

"It is rather late." he said, looking at her, anxiously, "It does not do to trust these spring evenings too implicitly. You should have a wrap around your throat."

"I do not feel cold," she said; looking at her, anxiously, "It does not do trust these spring evenings too implicitly. You should have a wrap around your throat."
