The Paris Conference.

public statement, be it ever so slight, the world because he possesses a peculiar gift of important truths in terms the other "Peg" who recently dethat all can understand--- and so easi- lighted the same audience. Miss ly understand, too, that their importance is apt to be missed---but because his position allows him to speak with authority. In the speech reported to-day he says much that has been said day he says much that is encouraging in already, much that is encouraging in was lucky to win, was admirable. Bethe extreme. The closing words might be adopted as the slogan of the Allies until the end, which approaches Hammond kept the audience in roars rapidly: "Keep steady and we will with songs and patter, and Mr. Ham-The necessity for this steadiness and the necessary, the absolute, certainty of the consequence he so confidently predicates are explained in the few words in which he sums up all that really matters to-day in the whole situation. Time, once neu-tral, is now on our side, so decisively on our side that only this steadines of purpose is necessary to achieve the complete victory that is essential Time will do it for us, and time will do it for two reasons: the first negative, because Germany's submarin war is failing more surely as each day goes by; the second positive, be-cause American troops and American

He also refers to a matter of transcendent importance, the great conference of the Allies that will be held, probably, this week in Paris. He states definitely—we believe for held, probably, this week in Paris, He states definitely—we believe for the first time—that America will be represented at it and also Russia, the new Russia, inarticulate and seeking a voice, which she may find there. It is probable that the States will delegate this important duty to General Pershing and Admiral Sims, and Ambassador Sharp may also be present. But whatever the constitution of the conference, there can be no question that it will be the most monentous to which the Allies will vehave drawn together in consultation. Politically, the aims of the Entente will be harmonised and confirmed in exact form. The relation to them of the United States will have to be understood clearly, still more so that of Russia. In fact, if any modification of those aims is found necessary it is more than likely that the change will affect Russia and be compelled by her position. Militarily, the spring campaigns will be discussed. That is the terse and prosale way of expressing it. Imagination, realising the tremendous issues that hang upon the discussion, is at a loss for words that might truly convey the meaning and purport of it all to the world. For at this conference will be forged the bolts that are to blast Germany. We believe that Germany herself for the line, when Macedonia and Mesopotamia leap suddenly and at a given signal into flame next April or May, or whenever the time will be, that signal will have been prepared this week in Paris, the nature and direction decided of the terrible blows that will be delivered without ceasing at the crumbling defence of the enemy. What is there determined will not be known to the world until its fruits are gathered, the actual tactics and strategy—where the Allies are to hit and when where the Allies are to hit and when and how—will not be apparent until it can no longer be concealed. But as a military conference alone, setting aside questions of peace and politics, it is plain that this is the greatest cil that has ever assembled, that it will seal forever the fate of Ger-many in the coming months which those that are past have already made
