

TO MERCHANTS VISITING THE LONDON FAIR

We extend a cordial invitation to visit our warehouses, situated at 21 to 27 Wellington street east and 30 to 36 Front street east, Toronto. In these warehouses, the most extensive in the Dominion, we show a new stock, a well-selected stock, bought by experts under the most favorable circumstances, such as buying in large quantities, and for cash, and from the largest manufacturers. Our samples can be seen at Tecumseh House, London, in charge of our representative, E. Burns.

A Romance of Chelsea Village and East Hampton Town.

There is, however, no telling where combatants like Alonzo and Dorinda will stop when they start on a line of aggressive conduct. It is not enough for them to see that their weapons strike home; to see the punctures, to know, whatever momentary exaltation of soul may stay the physical pain of the victim, that, sooner or later, the wounds must begin to bleed, and the tender flesh to burn with fever. There is a grosser warfare. They must see the suffering, they must hear the cries; they must realize that they have inflicted material damage before they can feel that they have done what they set out to do. Especially must their vengeance be complete when it constitutes what they consider merited punishment—and to judge and to punish is the especial mission of these right-thinking and right-doing people, who, being ever in the right, have but small pity for those erring mortals who have not their light.

So it was not long before Dorinda laid down the foil of polite irony, and took to broadsword practice. She had been content with the pleasure to be derived from outspoken conjectures as to her sister's probable behavior after she should have joined her "swell friends"—whether or no she would recognize her kinsfolk when she met them on the street—or look at any one who lived in a frame house—or use baking-powder in her kitchen. But now she relieved her mind with open and eloquent onslaught upon Randolph Wykoff, his mother, and all that they stood for and represented in the social scheme. She gave up going to the door to let Randolph in, and that duty was delegated to Alonzo, who performed it in absolute silence, with a discourteous hostility in his bearing that, had he not been Celia's brother, would have been that of a young gentleman who had been held, in his time, one of the prettiest middle-weight boxers that had ever appeared at Harvard College.

It was a most unpleasant state of things.

for the engaged pair, and they talked it over at every meeting. Wykoff was for going to Mr. Lee's and demanding an abatement of the nuisance; but Celia, who underestimated the strength of her position, told him that parental interference would only embitter her persecutors, and make her lot the heavier; and her lover unwillingly held his peace. It was Dorinda who brought matters to a climax.

Mrs. Wykoff had been ill. Her lungs were not over-strong, and she had been taken with something that looked like pneumonia. Randolph stopped at the Lees, late one January afternoon, to tell Celia of his mother's progress toward recovery. He was admitted by the servant—a rare event for attendance upon the front door was not among the handmaid's many duties. She let him into the parlor, and there he found Dorinda, volubly entertaining a young man and a young woman whom he at once guessed to be the much-vaunted Cargill and his bride-elect. Cargill was a tall young man with a large black mustache. His clothing had that effect of shiny and unwrinkled newness which is rarely to be observed save on the wire frames in the tailors' windows. Huge diamonds sparkled on his fingers, in his necktie, and even in a shamelessly exposed collar-stud. Mrs. Cargill, that was to be, was clad in a blue velvet dress that just held its own for brilliancy against Dorinda's red bodice of state.

The Cargill and the Cargill-expectant glanced at the Wykoffs as he entered and sat down in the farthest corner of the room. Dorinda did not even turn her head, but pitched the conversation in a higher key, so that he might lose no word of it.

"Was you at the Sweetmans' soiree?" she inquired.

"Nope," said Mr. Cargill, sucking the big silver head of his cane.

"I heard it was real elegant," Miss Lee's ran on; "I couldn't go—ma'am me had to go to a meeting of the church fair committee. I s'pose you know 'em going to have the Rebekah booth at the fair. Hope you're comin' to patronize me. I'll sell you some lem'nade—if you ever drink lem'nade, Mr. Cargill."

The simpler with which this speech was ended was a beautiful tribute to Cargill in his quality of man of the world.

"Ain't sellin' beer this trip?" was Mr. Cargill's jocular inquiry. "Then I guess I'll take lem'nade. Sell a stick with it?"

"Oh do hush," said the bride-elect, dabbing at him with her muff, and pretending to be scandalized at his wickedness. "I think lem'nade's real nice, don't you? Dorinda? I'm comin' to get some, I'm goin' to make him pay for it, too."

Two treble laughs and a bass laugh did honor to this witicism, and when the spasm of merriment was over, Dorinda began again.

"D'you see Mr. Cree at the Sweetmans'?" I think he's one of the nicest gentlemen I ever saw."

Celia was out; it was a quarter of an hour before she came in, and through that quarter of an hour Randolph Wykoff sat in the corner of the parlor and heard the society of a society that in one way might well be called, as it would have itself, "elgant."

This was bad enough, but there was worse yet. The visitors took their leave at last, and Dorinda followed them into the hallway. She closed the door behind her, but one door was a poor obstruction to Dorinda's voice, and Wykoff heard what probably it was intended that he should hear.

"Him? Oh, that's Mr. Wykoff—Celia's friend, you know—he ain't any of mine. I'd have introduced you, only I don't hardly know him well enough. No ain't fine enough for him, an' I thought my friends wasn't. Guess you ain't lost much, though."

When Celia came in Randolph told her, as gently as possible, but definitely and definitively, that thereafter he would come to the house only when her sister was not at home, and he kept his word.

Yet they had to see each other, and so they fell into a bad way of meeting in the streets. Celia contrived to let her lover know that on such a day a shopping tour would bring her through such and such a street at this or that hour; and as the time and place appointed, Randolph would meet her to walk home with her. This unwise arrangement brought itself to a timely end, happily for both of them. Celia's
