Suppose the sergeant of the drug would be given to Trenchard himself; he would think her careless of her promise; worse than that, he would be exposed again to temptation, and Dora knew enough of such cases as his to guess that effort of renunciation would be followed sooner or later by a reaction.

All this might be avoided were she to go and meet the sergeant on the road. She set out to walk towards Moyrath, along the high road was as quiet as any boreen that branched off from it to some outlying cottage. For a distance from Carriconna it was bounded on either side by tall hedges; these gave way to low stone walls, beyond either of which the country stretched away for many a lonely mile, though here and there a short ridge of hills narrowed the horizon. No spot apter for thought or reverie. The waning sun, arrested by the high and arching trees along a portion of the road, showed in patches and bread dars across it. The road was already almost dry again.

"A very strange afternoon indeed!" "A very strange afternoon indeed!" "So you can be, sergeant; but remember that the sick are not as we are."

"So you can be, sergeant; but remember that the sick are not as we are."
"I've tried to keep him from it all I can, most dry again.

thought Dora. She was not thicking of the weather, but of the afternoon's experi-

"So he really cares for me!" A woman of Dora's knowledge and experience could not indeed entertain much doubt on that point.

"And he suffered so! Yes, and he will have more to suffer yet, poor fellow! Will have more to suffer yet, poor fellow! Will he succeed? I have read—or did Aiec tell me!—that one scarcely ever does succeed. Well, will he succeed? I think that will depend a little upon me—a good deal, perhaps."

"That's if you'll take his place, ma'am."

"Very well, sergeant; you may consider me Dr. Maguire, if you like."

"Tis the best thing you could say for the master's sake, ma'am, I'm sure."

"I have the package, sergeant, but I think I shall send it back again to you unopened," said Dora, as she got down from the trap.

"I hope so, ma'am. Thank you ma'am.
Good day!" manic.

She turned a corner of the road and saw the sergeant driving towards her.

The sergeant draw up beside her.

Salute, and "Nothing wrong, ma'am, I hope?" "Not at all, sergeant; Mr. Trenchard seems decidely better this afternoon." "Very restless when I was with him, ma'am."

"He was asleep when I came out."
"Very glad, ma'am;" and this was something more than formula, for the whole expression of the sorgeant's face softened as he said it.

"I hope so, ma'am. 10ana you and Good day, sergeant!"

"Good day, sergeant!"

Dora passed through the "grand gates," and Sergeant Jones returned to Moyrath.

Dora liked to make friends with every-body. She had made friends that afternoon with Sergeant Jones. She would have been flattered had she heard all that the sergeant said of her in the housekeeper's room at Moyrath that evening.

sergeant?"
Sergeant Jones stiffened himself a little. His air was grave again.
The prim soldier considered that this strange affection of his master was an affair which involved, in some way, the honor of the family. It was something upon which he held that reticence the most severe and rigid was a prime duty on the part of a retainer. Sergeant Jones had felt himself under a cloud these two years past, not on his own, but on his master's account. If he continued to hold his head as erect as formerly, it was that he was prompted by the There are so many things that appear unnecessary, and which for the life of us we can see neither purpose nor end. continued to hold his head as creet as formerly, it was that he was prompted by the sense of duty, rather than (as of old) by the sense of duty, rather than (as of old) by the sense of inner rectitude. The whole matter was a troublous mystery to the sergeant. He saw a young and affectionate master—the sen of a revered master—alipping down what seemed to him to be the path of weakly self-indulgence; he was astonished, mortified, humiliated. But, he, with his wife, had guarded the secret jealously. He thought that his wife and himself had it for their own.

"Yes, ma'am," answered the sergeant; and after an emphatic pause, "I was to give it to himself."

Trenchard wishes it; he has spoken to me.

There was no mistaking the tone in which Dora said this.

The sergeant—a shrewd man enoughperceived that the honor of the family was in no danger here. The handsome widow was a friend, possibly even an ally.

Sergeant Jones became gallant; but in the interests of the family.

"You've walked a good piece, ma'am. We're a mile and three-quarters from the house. If you'll be so kind as to get up, I'll drive you home again."

Dora was quite willing, perhaps more than willing. She had divined already that the servant was in some degree his master's confidant.

When she was seated in the gig the sergeant took a small packet from his pocket and gave it to her.

"I' hope it won't be wanted, ma'am," said the faithful Jones.

"I' do not think it will, sergeant."

"You've had a talk with the master, ma'am?"

"You don't say so, ma'am! What, weal and tied up like that?"
"Sergeant," said Dora, "my husband was a doctor, and I learned something from him about many kinds of diseases. Your master is ill with an illness that requires a treatment of its own. He is a patient, and must be treated as such. He wants more than a common doctor. Not one doctor in a thoustnd knows what to do in such a case as this. Sergeant, you must turn doctor yourself and you must take your instructions from me."

"What instructions, ma'am?" said the sergeant, whose habitual phlegm did not avail him here. Dora had a kind of magnetism about her, which was not easy to resist.

"What do you think of your master, sergeant?" said she.

"Think of him, ma'am? Why that there was no one like him—bar his father—two years ago!"

The late James Redpath believed himself to have been the first person to put the verb "to boyoott" in print. One night during one of his visits to Ircland he sat writing a dispatch to a New York paper, when suddenly he found himself at a loss for a word to express what was then happening to Capt. Boyoott. "Use Boycott's name as a verb," said a priest at his elbow, and Redpath accepted the suggestion.

The torturing pains and distressing strengthening nervine, and a positive nervousness which accompany, at times, certain forms of "female weakness," yield like magic to Dr. Pierce Fravorite Prescription. It is purely vegetable, perfectly harmless, and adapted to the delicate organization of woman. It allays and subdues the nervous symptoms and relieves the pain accompanying functional and organic troubles.

Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription contains no alcohol to inebriate, no syrup or sugar to ferment in the stomach and cause distress; is as peculiar in the way it at s—there's nothing like it in the way it's sold. It's guaranteed to give satisfaction in every case, or the money paid for it is promptly refunded.

Read the guarantee on the wrapper. You lose nothing if it doesn't help you—but it will.

The system is invigorated, the blood miched, digestion improved, melancholy and nervousness dispelled. It's a legitimate medicine, the only one that's guaranteed to give satisfaction in the curre of all "female complaints."
