A Transformation.

It is a hideous struggle.
On first mounting, the horse had refused to move, standing there with his forefeet thrust out and firmly planted in the ground his ears lying close to his neck. Then sudlenly, without a second's warning, he had

Nobody had been frightened until then. That unexpected and vicious spring forward would have unseated most riders, but Trefusis kept his seat, As the brute swung round, he swung with him, and had a good hand on the rein, as he went wildly forward. Like a flash of lightning the horse tore past those standing on the hall foor steps, dashing onward toward the lawn

A lawn, of course, is as delightful a spot as one can meet with on which to try conclusion with a nasty-tempered horse; but, unfortunately. Adare's lawn, as I have lready stated, has a field lying beyond it a field divided from the great broad lovely lawn by a ha-ha. Down there on the right side of this ha-ha a light wire railing about 40 yards in length and one yard in height had been erected, to mark it dangerous—just to prevent people from jumping it, as the ha-ha has been sunk much lower upon the other side of it than on the part above it. It is towards this spot, marked dangerous, that the now infuriated animal is dashing, with its head between its forefeet, and every sinew strung. "Great heavens! I hope he will be able to turn him," says Adare, under his breath. He has changed color; he steps back a bit, and frowns nervously.

It is clear, however, to them all that Trefusis has no longer the slightest control over the animal he is riding. He is sitting him firmly enough, and is apparently doing all he can to turn him aside, without avail. There is always little or nothing to be done with a runaway.

Nearer, ever nearer, rush the horse and rider to that fateful spot in the ha-ha. Now they are are almost at it. Now—Fanny bursts into tears. Miss Anson covers her face with her hands. Terry, with her arms cast backward and her fingers clasping convulsively the chair sehind her, is leading forward, her face like marble, her eyes wide.

She is rigid, tense; her gaze is fixed immovably upon the tragic scene below. Now indeed the tragedy is at its height. The horse had reached the wire railing, has risen to it, has cleared it badly, and, has some with a sickening crash to the ground at the other side.
"Robbie! Robbie!" cries Mrs. Adare, rildly, "you should not have let him do it!" "My God! what a time to reproach a man !" says Adare, with a terrible glance at her. But even as he starts forward, the other men following him, they see Trefusis stagger to his feet, seize the reins—the horse has already risen, and is standing shivering next to him-and fling himself once more into the saddle.

A wild cheer bursts from those watching

"Oh, he is hurt!" says Terry, faintly. She drops into a chair. A wave of sickness passes over her. What is his pluck, or anything, to her, beside that line of blood running down his cheek ? They all see it new, that ugly stain, stealing from his forehead to his chin. Rut Trefusis himself appears either ignorant of t or indifferent to it. He has the brute well in hand now, and this time the victory seems to the man. The lower field makes a capital course on a small scale, and round it he takes him and then tur towards the house and thus up and over the ha-ha and past the group on the edges of the lawn, who cry to him in vain to stop. No power on earth would have stopped him then. Those looking on never quite forget his face—pale, with that streak of blood upon it, and his eyes flashing. If he never looked handsome before, he looks handsomer now than most men, and a thrill of pride in him, that she does not dare de-Ine, runs through Terry's heart. It is horrible, the way he is flogging the brute, he thinks; but she understands that, and

And now he has torn past them, down the lawn again, and has taken the horse over the ha-ha once more, but this time at his own pace and pleasure. And so on, antil he comes to them once more, and drops from the saddle to the ground, smiting, but breathing with a little difficulty. It had been a battle, but he had won. The now thoroughly cowed creature stands trembling in every limb, and almost sobbing, beside him.

"Sell him!" says he to Adare, as a groom leads the horse away. "I know his kind. I had a horse like that once. I conquered him too, but I found he required reconquering once a week. It wasn't good enough. It was too fatiguing."

"By Jove! I never saw such riding," says Larry, with honest admiration. Whatever else may be laid to Larry's charge, it can certainly never be the want of gener-

"He hasn't got any mouth," says Trefusis. He has glanced at Larry, as if uriously, first, and then has given him a friendly but deprecating shake of the head. "Seil him for anything you can get for him."

"I'd like to shoot him!" says Adare, wrathfully. "Here, come in and have a whiskey-and-soda. You must be dead

"A little shaken, I confess. The beast fell so stupidly. I'm afraid," dabbing his ace with his handkerchief, "I'm rather a spectacle, but it is a more graze. I teel sothing but my arm That's a bit stiff." "Well, come in and bathe it," entreats ais host, anxious y.

As he goes, he passes by Terry, still sitting in that garden-chair and still very pale. He stops before her.
"Well, I can do one thing as well as your cousin?" he says. There is undisguised riumph in his tone. It is open, flagrant. He seems, indeed, to glory in it. There eems to be no shame about him.

"Better," says Terry, slowly, and then, but he would never have said that. He would have been too generous.'

"He is perfection, I know. But you should remember that he can afford to be generous."
"He? Poor Laurence! What has he?" "Your friendship, at all events." There is an emphasis on the word, "That certainly," calmly.

At this moment Miss Anson lays her hand upon his arm. "You must come. You must, really."

eays she, with great agitation—"Miss J'More, oh, don't keep him. He must be in such pain. They tell me his arm has to be looked to at once. Heroes"—with a beatific smile at him—"never acknowledge pain, I know. And you—" There is a leligate appreciative page. lelicate appreciative pause.

Trefusis spoils it. He moves past her, politely, but indifferently.
"Look here, Adare!" he cries. "have you ot a cigar about you?"

ing to what is not intended for him, here gives way to mirth. That is, he gets behind a big laurel shrub planted in a tub and laughs silently but heartily for a full minute. Larry, who has followed him very kindly into his exile, under the mistaken impression that he is going into a fit, now stares at him as if he is the eighth wonder. Mr. Kitts restrains himself sufficiently to say, "one in the eye for her, old boy, eh?"
After which Larry leaves him, not with-

Untold Misery-What a Well-Known Commercial Traveler Suffered, and How He Was Cured .- Gentlemen,-About five years ago I began to be troubled with dyspepsia, and for three years suffered untold misery, from this terrible complaint. was at that time traveling for Messrs. Walter Woods & Co., Hamilton, and was treated by some of the best physicians in the country, but all to no purpose. I continued to grow worse, one day I was induced to try a bottle of Northrop & Lyman's VEGETABLE DISCOVERY, and to my great surprise and joy, I soon began to improve. I continued using this medicine, and when the third bottle was finished I found I was entirely cured; and as a year has elapsed since then, I feel confident that the cure is complete and permanent. To all afflicted with this distressing complaint I heartily recommend Northrop & Lyman's VEGETABLE DISCOVERY, believing that the persistent use of it will cure any case of dyspepsia. (Signed.) T. S. Origin of "Strike."

An early use of the word "strike" occurs in the London Chronicle for 1765. In the September of that year are numerous references to a great suspension of labor in the northern coalfield, and the colliers are stated to have "struck out" for a higher bounty before entering into their usual yearly "bond." In confirmation of Mr. Leaton Bienkinsopp's statement at the last reference, it may be added that the strike is twice called a "stick." (London Chronicle, October 8, 10.) One of Harriet Martineau's earliest pamphlets was a tract entitled "The Tendency of Strikes and Sticks to Produce Low Wages," published at Durham in 1834. The time-honored illustration of profitless labor, "carrying coals to Newcastle," probably received its first slap in the face during the strike of 1765. A paragraph dated Newcastle, Sept. 28, in the London Chronicle, says: "Tis very remarkable that on Wednesday several pokes of coals were brought from Durham to this town by one of the common carriers, and sold on the sandhill for 9 pence a poke, by which he cleared 6 pence a poke."
