GENERAL AGENCY atreams forment the traveller in the desert. Silently, quictly, but intensely he had longed for the day which was to set him free from the yoke which the conscription binds on every Frenchman, and which is often a source of keen saffering to the finishiants of her reunote and pastoral previnces. For the last few months, like a homesick schoolboy, he had counted the days that were yet to intervence before that much-desired release took place.

Ambrose was not endowed with a very vivid imagination, and he had nevertheless conjured up many a dream about his return to the little hamlet embowered in chestnut groves and lying in a quiet valley amidst the purple hills of Dauphine. There was a maiden, too, whom he had sometimes fanciad would make a tidy housewife to a hard-working laboring man. She was only fourteen when he left home; but if a she had happened not yet to have found a husband, who could tall that before Michaelmas-days a small cottage on the outskirts of the village, laif way up the hill where the church stood—he remembered it well; there was a field of clover at its back, and a tall, lime tree in front—might not be fitted up to the reception of a newly-married pair? To be sure he did not exactly know where the monor by to urnish it would come from, for Ambrose had nothing in the world put his pay, and the few pennies he could spare had been oftener put out at interest in the poor-box than in the savings-bank: but still it was something to this kabut on a summer's evening as the sun went down behind the hills, and the monor rose in silent beanty, gilding with her silvery light the wall of the town and the quaint old towers of the Church of St. Martin. Vision upon vision rose in the soldier's mind. No wonder that a smile hovered the world the town. The proceeds of the near the proposed of the poor box that he soldier's mind. Fire and Maine Insuance iness, Flatulence, Headache, Liyer Food, Palpitation, Sick Headache, est WORM MEDICINE ever used. ROBERT MARSHALL. E. S. HARRISON & CO., IOTARY PUBLIC AND BROKER. I. The air was as bainy, and the thoughts of home as weet, as they had been then so of home as weet, as they had been then that true-learned man. He had heard that true-learned man. He had heard the voice of God speaking to his soul. He had listened to it with the docility of one who, through the simplicity of faith and the plain logic of Christian principle, had unconsciously attained to heroic virtue. A charge had also come over his countennance since the last day he had strolled at through those fields in careless joyouaness of heart. It was a calmer and desperjoy which, from the very depth of his soul where it was lying, now shone in his eyes and gave dignity to his brow—the joy of saffering so mething for Him who suffered so much for us; the joy of saffering so mething for Him who suffered so much for us; the joy that foreshadows, if it does not fortsall heaven. He stood gazing at the setting sun with a calm, though wistful look. Perhaps he thought of its rays gilding at that hour with rosy light the highest of the Dauphine Alps. Perhaps he was parting with a still brighter vision; for his joy seemed to increase as he gazed longer on that sunset sky. At last he turned away and retraced his steps towards the town. It was no longer the warkite strain he had warbled the week before which rose to his lips, but the words of a hyma which the soldiers used to sing at the evening service of the confratermity, which the almoner had estabilished amongst them.
