

(d) The habit of careful and sharp self-questioning as a means of solving or explaining difficulties, and of giving familiarity with the truth involved in the subject studied.

(e) The habit of persistently studying the difficulties that necessarily occur in any subject pursued, until they are clearly understood.

(f) The habit of carefully reviewing all work done, and, before regarding it as completed, formulating it in simple, correct, and clear language.

