

of those whom he accompanied to Fort Erie in 1866. Mr. Wynn was an enthusiastic soldier, one who had the affairs of the old company very much at heart. His death occurred on February 14th, 1912, and his remains are interred in old St. Andrew's cemetery.

Of the many brave men who marched out of our town on that beautiful June morning of 1866 on their way to the scene of battle, few remain. As one veteran sadly remarked to another a few days ago:

Some are in the churchyard laid,
Some sleep beneath the sea,
And few are left of all that band
Excepting you and me."

Some are sleeping their last sleep in the graveyards of the town, some have been laid to rest in far distant lands. One by one they are answering the last call, and in a short time the newer generations will know little of the history of old Number 1, the company composed of the best of our Niagara men who so bravely upheld the honor of the British flag and of the old town to which they belonged. But the history of Niagara would not be complete without some mention of this military organization that was for so many years closely identified with the life of the town. Its members were at all times ready to respond when duty called; with them the love of country took precedence of all else; its need awakened their patriotic enthusiasm and they set succeeding generations an example they would do well to follow. No. 1 was famous in its time and served its day and generation well.

We have heard many accounts of the Fenian Raid, but none of them gave the many little incidents in which No. 1 figured. It is in these Niagara people are most interested. Much information that has probably never been told may be obtained from the few survivors of the Fenian raid who still reside in town. For this information (to quote Miss Carnochan):

"Go ask the unwritten history of those days,
As told by those fast fading from our gaze;
Go—ask the veterans of the war to tell
One half alone of all that then befell."
