

FUSSELL'S MILK

"WHY! THAT ACCOUNTS FOR THE MILK IN THE COCONUT!"

as if he could not remain quiescent any longer, rose and paced the noiseless floor; after one or two turns, he opened the door, and, after pausing a moment on the threshold of the small gallery, went on and stood before the closed picture of her whom he had wronged and driven from his house, and whose child he was now so impatiently longing to welcome.

With a hand that was firm and steady, though his lips quivered, he unlocked the black, concealing doors, and, throwing them gently open, stood gazing, with a sinking face, at the beautiful one which looked sadly down upon him. Then he turned away, leaving the face uncovered for the first time for twenty years.

Re-entering the library, he took up a letter which had lain close by his hand.

It, like the telegram, came from Harold, and, like the telegram, was short.

"I have found her," it said. "We are travelling homeward as fast as it is possible to do. Lady Jermyn whom we met on our way, accompanied us. I have tried to write an account of my meeting with Lillian, but my heart fails me; only by word of mouth can I tell the strange story of her, my dear uncle, and wait for your coming as patiently as you can your affectionate nephew."

"HAROLD."

This was not all. No description of the long-lost daughter. Not a word to show whether the writer was satisfied or disappointed with the result of his mission.

For the hundredth, for the thousandth time, Sir Talbot read and re-read the short epistle; and he had it still in his hands when the sound of carriage wheels broke upon the silence.

With a start—though his ears had been strained for hours since he had that welcome sound—the old man dropped the letter and stood upright, his white hand pressed to his forehead, his head drooping upon his breast.

As he stood thus, he heard the sound of hurrying feet, the tramp and sudden stopping of horses' feet, the noise of heavy trunks set down in the hall, and then a woman's—a girl's—voice.

As the last sound burst upon his ear, the old man, despite his nerves and well-trained self-command, sank back in the chair, and covered his eyes.

But, as there came a knock at the door, he stood upright, and in a calm though low voice, gave the response "Come in!"

The door opened, and Harold entered.

His face was tanned by exposure to the weather, and, though slightly thinned and haggard, looked handsomer than ever.

Without a word, he grasped the old man's hand, and held it for just a minute. Then, although Sir Talbot pointed to a chair opposite that into which he had slowly sunk, he stood anxiously watching the thin, pale face.

"Well, Harold," said Sir Talbot, slowly, and almost inaudibly, "you are back?"

"Yes, sir," said Harold; "and not alone, thank Heaven! Are you well enough to hear?"

"Where is—she?" broke in Sir Talbot, keeping his hand before his eyes.

"Gone to her room, sir," said Harold, watching the old man anxiously. "She is very tired—very, as is only natural."

"Only natural," echoed Sir Talbot. "And—and I wished to prepare you, sir."

"To prepare me!" said the old man, looking up and scanning the handsome face anxiously.

"For the meeting, sir," said Harold. "It must needs be a trying one."

Sir Talbot inclined his head, and put his hand upon the open letter.

"You have not given me much preparation here, Harold," he said, not reproachfully, but questioningly.

Harold nodded.

"I could not, sir; I attempted it, but it overwhelmed me. It would need the pen of a novelist to tell the CHAPTER V.

"My Name is Lillian Leigh."
(Concluded.)

FAINT, puzzled looked crossed Harold's handsome face.

"She was Sir Talbot's wife," he said; "and you are his daughter. Miss Leigh—may I not call you Lillian? We are cousins—"

Again the fierce light burned in her eyes as the lips curved.

"Yes," she said; "we are cousins, I suppose."

"We are," he said, and a half-hidden satisfaction lingered in his voice. "Yes, we are cousins, Lillian; there fore you can realize how deeply I feel this wondrous chance which has restored you to us! As it is," he went on, bending over her, with quivering lips and flashing eyes, "I can scarcely persuade myself that I am not dreaming! It is too good to be true. Lillian, and his strong

SOUR STOMACH

"I used Cascarets and feel like a new man. I have been a sufferer from dyspepsia and sour stomach for the last two years. I have been taking medicine and other drugs, but could find no relief only for a short time. I will recommend Cascarets to my friends as the only thing for indigestion and sour stomach and to keep the bowels in good condition. They are very nice to eat."

CHAPTER VI. SUBTLE PLAYING.

It was August, and four weeks had passed since Harold Woodleigh had discovered his missing cousin. In the library of Woodleigh Hall sat Sir Talbot; although the twilight had nearly given place to the darkness of a summer night, the only light in the room came from a small reading lamp, and half in shadow Sir Talbot sat, his head resting on his hand, his eyes fixed upon a telegram which lay upon his knee, and which contained the curt announcement: "We hope to reach home by nine to-night."

From time to time Sir Talbot raised his eyes from the piece of pink paper to the heavy, marble clock on the mantelpiece, and, as he did so, the light, falling on his face, revealed the change which the last four weeks had effected.

The old, stately, patrician air was there, but the cold, set look had given place to an expression of suppressed impatience, of hope overshadowed by doubt, and of an intense wishfulness.

Once or twice the white hand strayed to his thinly cut lips, and at times covered his eyes.

About the house, as usual, reigned the almost solemn quiet which was its great characteristic, but in the drawing room lights were shining, and in a suit of sumptuous rooms upstairs head servants were moving about as if they were expecting and important arrival.

Presently the hour of nine was struck by the stable clock, and Sir Talbot, now, Lillian, to get away from here! Do you still feel that dread of the stage?"

"Yes," she said, quickly, in a low voice; "I would do anything rather than travel by it. Can we not get away from this dreadful place at once?"

"Just what I was thinking," he said, and, with knitted brows, he paced to and fro. Suddenly he stopped, and, looking at her black dress, said:

"Can you ride?"

"Yes."

"You can!" he said, with evident satisfaction. "Now this problem is solved! This cloak, see—you can make an impromptu habit of it, can you not?"

She glanced at the long cloak, and rose, with a feverish eagerness.

"Yes," he said; "then we can manage! One of the men who came with me can remain for the coach, and you can have his horse. Half an hour's work will transfer these foreign saddles into a lady's. We can start by dawn—steady riding will take you back to civilization, and then for England! Oh, Lillian, imagine what I feel at this moment! Think of the old man waiting there for you—his you, his child!"

If he expected to see any sign of tenderness and emotion, he was disappointed. With slow, wearied gait, the girl, Lillian Leigh—as she had become from that moment—walked to the window, and, pulling aside the curtain, looked out on the dawn.

Then, turning to him with outstretched hands, she panted:

"Take me away! Take me away from this awful place!"
