Aviation.

Wireless telegraphy impresses the human mind with a sense of mystery and awe because it is so intangible. The human mind, however, prefers to be impressed by the whole of the human senses; it loves to see things with the eye, hear them with the ear, and so to comprehend a tangible object. The conquest of the air has been the ideal romance of the ages, and although it is now on the eve of actual achievement, romance will lend to aviation a lingering halo. It is the human being himself that has taken to the air, exulting in this new adventure, this emancipation from the terrestrial clod, and glorying in his freedom. And to make his freedom more complete he now has the means to receive and to give, by signals or by word of mouth, messages from and to the grovelling millions of gravity or his co-navigators of the airy oceans. Verily has he given "to airy nothing" a local habitation and a name.

The world's mind is at present full of the possibilities of the aeroplane as means of communication, the possibilities of the aeroplane as their sphere. Here, again, we have the means of rapid mail services and the dissemination of news.

As one of the world's greatest airways and of the Empire's means of air communication in particular we cannot do better than mention the route to India. London to India by air, via Egypt, Bagdad, Karachi, Bombay, Calcutta! And this and all other air routes to India have passed entirely under the direction of the British Empire. In India we have an ideal country for flying, whether from such factors as meteorological conditions, easily-made landing grounds or local supplies of liquid fuel. Aviation will play a great part in the development and progress of India.

Then India is only the half-way house to Australia and other important points of the Empire. Again, in Africa we shall have the Cape to Cairo air route, with branch routes for the purpose of surveying and exploring great expanses of territory in the Dark Continent. Here the airship will sail clear of the fever swamps and unfordable rivers. It will be secure from the dangers of the tropical jungle paths. Configuration of the land will present no difficulties, and the desert no terror. Teeming millions hitherto bound in the darkness of superstition and ignorance shall receive the light of learning, and in due course profit by civilising influences and the scientific development and exploitation of the natural resources of their country.

In surveying the Empire communications we find that wherever civilisation and commercial activities hope to make progress the essential factor is the development of the means of communication. The ultimate goal is the co-ordination of the Empire's means of communication, be it under the sea or on the sea, underground or upon its surface, and through the air. They are the Empire's arteries and nerves, and upon them depends the exploitation of a self-contained Empire, ability to bring the British race into the closest social intercourse and the such intimate relations that all subjects may learn of and discuss any subject of Empire interest and importance as nearly as possible at the same moment—a synchronisation of thought. Let us, therefore, concentrate upon the development of our communications. Then shall our ships be sure of markets, our territories receive ample development, and our people boundless scope for initiative and enterprise. The competition of the foreign flag shall not be feared, nor outside markets disturb our industries. In this way shall we build up a self-contained, free and independent Empire.—The Financier, London.

Mr. Lilloy George's Blunder.

Sober minded Englishmen generally revolt against the hangman's job, now that it is offered them. The first effect of bringing William to London would be to let hell loose in the baser sort and possibly endanger his life in a way worthy of the Roman arena, when victims of war were thrown to the lions. The next effort would be to enlist every German in abiding hatred against Great Britain. There is no use talking of reason in the matter. Reason is dethroned at such times. Then there is the futility of it. The only thing to be gained by the trial of the arch-criminal is the complete exposure of the real facts before the world, and especially before the German people. No process could be taken more calculated to defeat that object than bringing him to England and trying him in English. It would raise such a fume of hate as would completely hide, or, worse, still, distort the facts, which would all be seen ready done by the announcement. That cannot now be helped; but the decision can yet be recalled. Let the trial be held in Germany or on neutral ground. Insist only that all shall be widely published. Then, in spite of lying, there is nothing hidden that shall not be known.—Montreal Witness.
