Last week The New York Sun drew attention to a view of the situation advanced by The Atlanta Constitution, which is characterized as "the most important political journal now published in the old Slave States." The Sun says of its Southern contemporary that it is thoroughly Democratic in its ideas of government, and at the same time Protectionist as regards all questions of taxation and the tariff; while for ability and influence is stands high. In a remarkable article, which The Sun copies, The Constitution de-And the tenth points of a tenth seem of the programment and a tenth seem of the tenth point is remembered and possible of the property of the property of the remembered and the tenth point is remembered as a supposed, and the tenth point of the property of the property

A good many people appear to utterly fall in their attempts to grasp the relations between the Pope of Rome and the people of Ireland. There is a good deal of wild talk about "taking politics from Italy," when the fact is politics—conventionally so called—are not involved at all. The right of a man to enter into contracts, and his duty to observe them, can hardly be called a party quession. Such rights and duties have been so long and clearly established that it is nonsense to treat of them as politics. The Pope does not say that the Irish people shall vote for certain candidates. In this respect he does not go nearly so far as Archbishop Lynch is in the habit of going. He does not forbid the Irish Catholics to continue their agitation for Home Rule and against the Government of the day. What he condemns is some of the methods of the agitators. We may be at one upon the tariff question with a Canadian politician, and at the same time censure him for buying votes. The Pope may think Home Rule a good thing, while also condemning a bad way of getting that good thing. Morally his position is unassailable by argument, while politically he is not committed. This, we fancy, is the true meaning of his recent deliverance upon the Irish question.

Hanlan may as well bow to the inexitable. He will never be as young again as he once was

Ports Despatch to The London Docu Tegraph.

An amusing story comes from St. Petersburg. A few days ago the Czar went, without previously amouncing his visit, to a religious nouse where His Majesty was received but not recognized. When the Czar asked that divine bouse where His Majesty was received but not recognized. When the Czar asked that divine service should be celebrated a monk replied that it was impossible, as the priests were all asleep. But some people outside, who had seen the Czar enter the establishment, hastened to warn the monk who their visitor was. The monksaccordingly proceeded to officiate in the church. Unfortunately several of them gave unmistakable signs of having refreshed themiselves too copicusly at luncheon, which so incensed the Ozar that on returning to the palace he sent at once for the Clief of the Holy Synod. The offending monks have since been banished to distant monasteries.

She Mistork the Shadow for the Shere consisted by the brilliancy of the electric lights occurred in this city Saturday evening, which caused a young lady to take a chilly bath in the beautiful Williamette. As a prominent young law student, accompanied by a lady friend, was stepping out of a skiff on to the landing at Monteith's mil., the lady, mistaking the brilliantly reflected shadow of the landing for the actual one, stepped out of the boas, and at once went out of sight in a considerable depth of water. The young man, possessing all the presence of mind characteristic of the legal fraternity, immediately dived after her, and after considerable difficulty rescued her.
