Grip extends his sympathy to the Electors of West Toronto in advance. They will soon be called upon to pass through the tribulations of a three-cornered election contest, about as severe an affliction as an unoffending constituency can endure. Especially would he commiserate the "horney-handed son of toil," who is likely to be the chief sufferer. Already the working man's candidate is in the field in the person of the handsome and talented young beaverbacker, Mr. A. W. WRIGHT, whose portrait we present above. In a few weeks (or months) the writs will be issued, and then the regular Grip and Tory standard-bearers will step to the front, and, of course, they will be working men's candidates too. Then the bugle will sound and the fray will commence. Grip will not venture to predict how it will end; he is not a party bird, but in this, as in all other cases, he leaves the issue to the good sense of the electors, and confidently hopes for the triumph of the Right, with or without the W.
