"It is an excellent and useful thing to be a first-class maker of cheese, but the maker of cheese is likely to be the more successful in that art and become a much more useful and capable member of the community if the training in the technical art has been superimposed on a wider knowledge and a more generally cultivated intelligence. It ought to be remembered in all institutions primarily devoted to technical training that the man or the woman is always of greater importance than the art taught them, and that improvement in their general mental and physical powers and their whole efficiency and morale should invariably form the foundation of all the teaching given them."—P.
