And the house having resumed in committee:

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Chairman, the two points of order which have been raised already in the committee relate to the whole proceedings of the committee and your right to preside in the committee and the right of the committee to sit as a committee of the whole. The point I should like to raise now is that the business which has thus far come before the committee, which you purported to deal with from the chair, is a nullity.

I base this upon two aspects of the motion which you put so precipitately this afternoon, denying at the time the right of hon. members who were on their feet to address you on important points of order and questions of privilege.
