the Boer war is approaching the final stage. The Netherlands government has again announced that it cannot make a move for European intervention; the Brit-ish commanders are making many captures show which way the wind is blowing.

The government of Cape Colony has forbidden the farmers to sell horses to any but the government, and is compelling them to sell to the government. This is a species of requisitioning. But it is better for the farmers to sell under compulsion than be robbed out and out, which is the Boer method.

It is just possible that the financial ditor of The London Times is right in autioning English capitalists to go steady n grasping at American schemes. Even J. P. Morgan may overstep the bounds of prudence, and if a crash should come the small investor will be hit hardest.

Prussian railways and public works are boycotting American oil in the interest of the Russian product. When first-class light is needed, however, the American article is allowed. Is this the first move in a European trade combination against America?
