In the course of the trial of Captain Clarke, lately convicted in San Francisco of extreme cruelty to seamen on board the ship Sunrise, the following evidence was introduced:

A Brutal Sea Captain

August Whipfenning, one of the sea men, testified: I was an able seaman on the Sunrise, in the port watch; Corrigan and others were in the watch with me: I received punishment the last of June; I was sending the foretopsail lift down; it leads from the crosstrees to the yardarm: I had the lift in the top and was drawing it down to the deck when it got foul of the leech lines, and I hauled it over on the starboard side to clear it and had to drop it; my arm got tired and I could not hold the lift; the mate cried out, "Come down here, you ——;" when I reached the deck the mate knocked me down, and gave a blue eye; said the mate, "What did you let go of that line for?" I said I could not help it; he knocked me down again; I said to the Captain, who was standing near; "Do you allow such things as this on the ship?" he said "yes." I said I would see about it when I got to San Francisco; then he asked the mate to put me in irons; this was between eight and nine o'clock in the morning; he, the captain, ordered the mate to trice me up, and so he did, and I hung there until 3 o'clock in the afternoon; then they cut me down and gave me fifteen minutes to get my breakfast, which was made up of bread starboard side to clear it and had to drop
