

north, thus ensuring excellent and uniform light and admirably adapting it for microscopic work carried on by a large class. In a similar section of the building, east of the central hall, with similar front arrangements to ensure light for microscopic work, are located two smaller laboratories to be employed in the teaching of surgical pathology, neuropathology and clinical pathological technology; and private rooms for the instructors of those branches are arranged to open upon these larger laboratories. In order to provide for special occasions when a larger body of men are likely to require temporary accommodation than is ordinarily contemplated in either of these laboratories, it has been arranged that a movable partition may be withdrawn so as to throw the two rooms into one. In addition to the above apartments a number of small rooms devoted to storage or special technical work are provided upon this floor or elsewhere in the building in connection with the general chair of pathology.

Besides the numerous laboratories, research rooms, etc., there are two demonstration and two lecture rooms in the building. The two demonstration rooms each seat 185 students. These rooms communicate with two preparation rooms each. At the rear of the building there are two large lecture rooms, each seating 400 students. Students enter these rooms from a landing at the main stair midway between the first and second floors. The floor of the lecture rooms are on a level with the basement, and the lecturer will enter directly from the basement level, and all specimens needed to illustrate the lectures will be brought through this entrance, thus saving the crossing of the halls through which classes move. The most modern apparatus has been installed for light and heat and ventilation.

The architecture is distinctly "Pennsylvanian," and conforms to that of the dormitory system, the new law school building, gymnasium, engineering hall, and the stadium of the University. It forms at present one of the most imposing sights in Philadelphia.
