

A MYSTERIOUS QUEST.

CHAPTER XXV.

The Surprises of An Hour.

"I am sorry to trouble you," he now said, addressing the dying man, "but as a lawyer and a citizen, I feel it incumbent upon me to suggest that you should make a will, Mr. Delancy. If you do not, there will be more wrangling and litigation after your death than before it, and this, I have no doubt, you wish to avoid."

"Yes, yes!"

"Shall I listen to your wishes, then? Have you decided to what friend or friends you would like to leave this money?"

"I have decided," said the sick man. "I wish it all to go to one person."

"No matter how large the sum may be?"

"No matter how large the sum is; the larger the better. All to one person, I say. Ah! this is a delight after years of vain desire and want."

"The lawyer drew up a small table, placed upon it writing materials, and began to fill in the draft of a will which he had brought with him. While he was doing this, I talked with the doctor, and lent such assistance as was necessary to make the dying man comfortable and keep up his strength. When it came for him to name the person to whom he wished to leave his money, I withdrew as far from him as possible, but the room was too small for me to escape hearing the eager whisper that left Mr. Delancy's lips, even if the words had not been the familiar ones:

"Hamilton Degraw."

"You wish—" the lawyer stammered, as much taken back as I was myself.

"To leave all my property, real and personal, to this gentleman, whose name you say is Hamilton Degraw."

"But, I now cried, with an embarrassment easily to be understood, 'I am a stranger to you; as much of a stranger as either of these gentlemen. I pray you to reconsider this matter. I do not need your wealth. Besides—'

"Don't waste the precious moments," he entreated, with a burst of his ominous cough. "You are a stranger, but you have a face like my brother Frank. He was the most loyal soul alive, and so I believe are you. And that is what I want; loyalty and truth in my heir. They will both be needed. I forewarn you. Write down the name," he now commanded the lawyer; "and be sure you make the will legal, or I will rise from my grave to reproach you."

"There was no use in trying further discussion. He was in full possession of his faculties, as even the doctor was ready to swear; but he was growing very weak, and opposition robbed him of even the slight remains of strength which were still left him. Mr. Cutting, who was pale as the paper on which he wrote; put down my name, as requested, and then, asking the doctor to call in his man from the buggy before the door, he put the pen in the dying man's fingers, and watched him breathlessly, as we all did—I no more than the rest—while he scrawled those few words which in one moment raised me from a gentleman of respectable means into a man of fortune.

"The sigh of relief which followed the completion of his signature came from his breast, not mine. I was in a daze, and realized little of the importance of the moment. I did not even fully comprehend the looks of pardonable astonishment and good-natured sympathy that passed between the two professionals present, or notice when or how the witnesses affixed their names to this most hurried and remarkable of wills. I was only conscious of a great oppression, as if a burden under which I felt unable to stagger had just fallen upon my shoulders, and was greatly relieved when the sick man called me by name and said:

"Now I am going to tell you what I wish you to do with this money, if these gentlemen will only leave us alone."

"The lawyer, who had just stepped forward to offer me his hand in congratulation, stopped, and looked as if he did not know whether to proffer this ceremony or not. But when he observed my relieved countenance, he grew quite cheerful, and, warmly wringing my hand, whispered:

"It is a matter of three million, Degraw; so be careful what you promise."

"I stared; I could not take in the figures at first; but when I did, I felt actually chilled as if a dash of cold water had been thrown upon me. Three million! I hardly dared to look the reckless giver of this fortune in the eye. 'Three million!' And two hours before I had neither heard his name nor he mine. 'What mystery!' thought I. 'I hope he will tell me what he wants me to do with all this money.'

"The two gentlemen had by this time withdrawn into the hall, the doctor whispering as he passed me: 'Raise your voice if you see him going. There is nothing more we can do for him now but close his eyes.'

"A task which it seemed for the moment as if we should not be called upon to perform, for when I turned toward him he already lay like one in his last rest, save that his hands still moved among the blossoms I had given him. But when he felt me near, he raised his heavy eyelids and beamed upon me with an inexplicable smile that was at once sad and searching.

"Will it be a great disappointment to you to lose the use of the money I have just put into your hands?"

"My cheeks flushed; it was a little hard to see the prospect of so much wealth dissolve into nothing, with a suddenness equal to its coming; but my tone, I am sure, showed no real regret as I answered:

"It is your wealth, and I have not the shadow of a claim upon it. Whatever you wish me to do with I will do; that you may rely upon."

"Even if it involves trouble and sacrifice?"

"Most decidedly!"

"Ah, Providence is kind to send me just the man I need in my extremity. Receive my thanks, and forgive me that I seemed to give you personally what I only meant to give you in trust for another. Why I felt it necessary to do this, you will understand when I tell you that my real heir is as yet a person unknown—a person for whom I have not time to seek and for whom you yourself must look as soon as opportunity offers."

"But—"

Why I felt it necessary to do this, you will understand when I tell you that my real heir is as yet a person unknown—a person for whom I have not time to seek and for whom you yourself must look as soon as opportunity offers."

"But—"

"I will tell you exactly what she must be. She must be young, beautiful, charming and good. She must be a resident of New York, and she must have for her name the simple one of Jenny Rogers. That is all I ask. When you find such a girl, and have studied her character enough to know that she will do me credit as my heir, then I ask you to hand over to her, by deed of gift, all the fortune which for so many years has been without benefit to man or woman."

"I stood aghast. What sort of a proposition was this! Was not the man in sound mind, after all? Some girl, any girl who bore a certain name and fulfilled certain conditions, was to reap the benefit of three million dollars, and I was to be the man to choose this girl!"

"He saw my perplexity and shook his head in seeming trouble.

"You shrink from the task!" he exclaimed. "You cannot understand why I impose upon you the burden of such a responsibility. But whom shall I ask to bear it, if not you? I have not a friend; I am dying, and my only hope of peace lies in the thought that this wealth, which has come so late, shall adorn the life and elicit the gratitude of some one bearing the name that is dear to me."

"It is the name, then, I cried, 'which is of importance. You do not care so much for her station in life, though, of course, this must be respectable.'"

"Only care that she shall be lovely to look at, pure of soul, and kindly of spirit. I had rather she were not otherwise favoured by fortune. I should like to have her raised suddenly into prosperity. If she is the girl I see in my mind's eye, she will not be spoiled by it."

"But 'Jennie Rogers'! It is a common name; I shall run across a dozen or more in a great city like New York."

"You will know my heiress when you see her; real worth always shows in the face. Besides, you will have ample opportunity to choose amongst them. I give you a year, Mr. Degraw, and as this understanding between us is a secret, no one need ever know the reason of your interest in these girls till you see fit to make the deed I request. Oh, it is a dream of mine! May I hope to see it fulfilled?"

"I felt like saying 'No'! I felt tearing up the will he had just signed and so shirk a task that at this moment seemed too bizarre for any quiet man's performance. But the expression of his eyes stopped me. I could not refuse what was so dear to this dying man. Though trouble and annoyance must follow, I resolved to make the promise which would send him out of this world in peace.

"I will do what you ask," I declared. "I will visit New York, make the acquaintance of such girls as are known to bear this name, and when I have found one that in my judgment is worthy to become the possessor of three million, I will make your fortune over to her. Is that all you require?"

"Yes, yes, but three million!"

"That is the amount, I am told."

"A radiant delight overcame his pallid countenance, and he said to me: 'Had they but known a queen of the girl you choose. In my grave I shall feel her pleasure. Though I could not do this for thee, sweet'

Jenny, he exclaimed, lifting one arm to heaven with an energy that surprised me, 'I can, as least, do it for one who shall mirror thy rare nature and bear thy beloved name!'

"This look and the accompanying gesture were a revelation.

"It is, then, for the sake of a Jenny Rogers you once knew, that you desire this disposition made of your money? I ventured, anxious to learn if the cause which influenced him to this action was a natural one.

"Yes, yes," he cried. "Oh, if my strength would only last till I could tell you of her gentle beauty, her heavenly pity, the sweetness of her looks and the comfort of her words to me, in the days when I was such an invalid that I could not answer her back or even smile when she handed me in a flower at my broken window!"

"It was years ago, after I had a paralytic stroke and lay in a miserable basement, in a condition more helpless than that in which I am now. She saw me in passing, and moved by my pale face, I suppose, stopped, and gave me a little bundle of fruit which she was carrying home for her own meal. Poverty recognizes poverty, and I saw hers, but I could not say her nay nor refuse her gift, nor even thank her for what made my heart leap with joy; and when she passed again and yet again, each time with a smile that filled my dark room with the sunshine of heaven, I grew to live in the light of her coming and going; till there was no daylight for me if she did not pass, and no night shadows for me if she did. I was ignorant of her name. She never thought to tell me, and I had no power to ask. But I saw that her hands were rough with work, though her face was one of the loveliest I could have seen, and sometimes I caught a glimpse of the heavy bundle which she always carried on the further side of her, as if she knew I would strive to see it so heavy and yet be unable to relieve her.
