CHAPTER X.

"Thea, Evadne, I wish to speak to you," said Lady Scarsdale. "I have something very important to discuss with you. Come to my dressing-room."

Lady Scarsdale's dressing-room was a large and handsome one with a bay-window, the view from which over the Edenwood hills was very fine. Lady Scarsdale sunk into the easy-chair and the girls took possession of the sofa. The conference was solemnly opened by her ladyship.

"I want to speak to you, my dear children," she said, "on a most important matter. Some mothers would act upon their own judgment in similar circumstances; I prefer to consult you."

Thea looked at her mother in surprise. Evadne smiled to herself. She had guessed somewhat shrewdly at her mother's plan all along; Thea had never dreamed of them.

"I have received an offer of marriage," said Lady Scarsdale. "If it had been an ordinary offer, that is, from an ordinary person, I should not have given it a second thought; but it is not. If I accept this offer, I shall marry one of the richest men in England. I need not say that I allude to Mr. Cameron; and Lady Scarsdale affected to be occupied with the gold bracelet that she wore on her wrist. She did not care just at that moment to meet the gaze of either daughter.

There was a brief pause, her ladyship hoping that her daughters would interpose.

"Mr. Cameron," said Thea, in strong accents of disapproval. "Oh, mamma, he is quite a pebehan."

"Mr. Cameron!" cried Evadne. "Why, mamma, he is worth three millions of money!"

Lady Scarsdale looked much relieved as these more cheerful words fell on her ears.

"He is, indeed, my dear, and owner of a place which is really a palace. Now let us discuss the matter fairly, frankly, and in all its bearings."

"But, mamma," cried Thea, "it cannot be thought of! There is that disagreeable girl Diana."

"I shall manage her, Thea," her ladyship answered coolly; "she need be no obstacle."

"I shall never like her," said Thea, decidedly.

"There will be time enough to discuss that," rejoined her ladyship impatiently. "Let us first see how the matter will affect ourselves."

"I would put up with a great many Dianas to live at such a place as Furness," declared Evadne, on whom her mother smiled approvingly.

"Diana need not be considered in the matter," said Lady Scarsdale; "we must think of ourselves. Our poverty is so well known that I need not now mind alluding to it. We have everything but money. No, I am wrong; we have no home. I cannot tell you how long I long for a home—a home of our own; but, as you know, of late years I have not been able to keep one, and indeed, if it had not been for the invitations of our friends, we must have been shipwrecked long ago. I cannot call the London house home. It is simply a place of torture to me, for I can never find money enough to meet the expenses. I did not tell you, but last year, Evadne, I was compelled to sell a diamond brooch that had been your father's birthday gift to me.

This year I could not manage matters at all and I left the house. Ah, my dear children," she continued—and there was a ring almost of pathos in her voice—"you do not know what I have endured in order to keep you in the society that your birth entitles you to enjoy! I have suffered humiliation upon humiliation, and only last year I had to beg Madame Lachose almost on my knees to let us have dresses. She declared she would not until I had paid something off my account. I had nothing wherewith to pay her. No one is more insolent than Madame Lachose when one owes her money."

"I think the footman you engaged last year was more insolent still," said Evadne. "I shall never forget the expression of the man's face when he waited at the table."

"There was cause for the expression," declared Thea. "We seldom had anything more than cold mutton or cutlets. As for the claret, mamma, I was ashamed when it was poured out into a glass; vinegar and water would have been more palatable."

"It was only a shilling a bottle," murmured Evadne, plaintively; "and you cannot expect much body or flavor at that price."

"Hush, Evadne!" cried Lady Scarsdale. "I do not like to hear such unseemly discussions."

Thea laughed a little bitterly.

"What a sad thing it is to be poor! I did not care to allude to it at the time, but I did feel the insolence of those servants. How is it that servants, above all other people, have so great a contempt for poverty? Do you remember the cook telling us that, if she remained in our house, she should forget all she had ever learned?"

"I know the servants in the kitchen lived much better than we did," remarked Evadne. "But it was the hired brougham that I disliked most. Mamma, do you remember the struggle for the last evening party—how many tradespeople declined to serve us? Three or four of the best florists would not supply us with flowers."

"The worst of it is that both flowers and wine have not been paid for yet," said Lady Scarsdale, mournfully. "I certainly could never give another party in London whilst in my present position."

"And this man has three millions of money," put in Evadne. "What a contrast!"

"I have not said more than I was compelled about our financial embarrassments," continued Lady Scarsdale. "No one can understand what torture it is to be fashionable and poor. I have never hitherto been able to see how the struggle would end. Of course, I had just a hope that you girls would marry well, and be able to help me in your turn; and that is the only hope which has sustained me."

"After that, it will be a strange thing if you marry first, mamma!"

"Very strange!" murmured her ladyship. "Now; what do you think, my dear children? Give me your opinion frankly, honestly, and clearly. You see that we shall have a magnificent home. I have heard that Mr. Cameron has a fine stud of horses; I know his carriages are most luxurious. Nothing could be better than the house itself—one might receive royalty in it—and three millions of money is worth some consideration."

"There is the man to be taken into account," said Thea.

"Certainly. I admit that he is a drawback. So is the girl. But I think myself that the advantages outweigh the disadvantages."

"The disadvantages mean Mr. Cameron and his daughter?" said Evadne.

"Yes," answered her ladyship, with some little reluctance.

"I suppose, mamma," continued Evadne, "that we should go with you; as a matter of course, would be our home as well as yours."

"Most certainly, Mr. Cameron is a man very easily managed, and Furness would be as much your home as it now is Diana's."

"Could we invite our friends—the Capels and Sturats?"

"The more aristocratic the visitors the more welcome they would be," said Lady Scarsdale.

Then Thea spoke:

"Mr. Cameron has three millions of money, mamma—what will he do with it?"

"Diana will be his heiress," replied her mother—"nothing, I suppose, can alter that. He would be sure, however, to provide handsomely for me."

"Would he do anything for us, do you think, mamma?" asked Thea.

"I should think, my dear, that that would depend entirely on how you both behaved to him," replied Lady Scarsdale. "That is one of the matters I want you to take into consideration. You have no dowry. Never, I think, were girls well born so poor—the granddaughters of an earl without one shilling between them. Of course, if I marry, my little income will be settled on you jointly; but, as you know, it is very small. It is not a fortune that would tempt any one to marry you."

"That is true," laughed Evadne, the sunshine glittering on her golden hair.

"Mr. Cameron is a generous man," continued her ladyship, "and if you please him, if you both behave nicely to him, I have every reason to believe he will give you each a handsome dowry."

"What should you call a handsome dowry, mamma? Perhaps about twenty thousand pounds each?" queried Evadne.

"That would be nothing to him, and everything to us," allowed Lady Scarsdale.

"It would be a great thing for us," said Evadne, slowly. "It would altogether change the current of our lives. I need think no more about the matter, mamma; I say 'Yes' at once."

"We shall never like the girl Diana," remarked Thea, coldly, determined that something like a thrill of pity went through what little heart Evadne possessed. She knew what her mother's management could be like.

"What do you say, Thea?" asked Lady Scarsdale.

"I say 'Yes' to a bad alternative," replied Thea, slowly. "I wish you could have the mansion and the money without the marriage."

"So do I," said Lady Scarsdale; "but that is impossible. After all, it will be almost unalloyed gain—from penury to affluence at one bound. I must, however, give you this piece of advice, my dear girls: Hold your own. Mr. Cameron naturally looks up to me, and has a great idea of my superiority; he must never be allowed to abate that."

"Never," agreed Evadne. "We must keep the family well to the front. I can easily annihilate Diana by a few references to our ancestors."

Suddenly Thea turned to her mother and sister.

"Do you not think," she asked, "that it will be rather painful for Diana? She has been mistress for some time and we talk coolly of taking possession, as though she did not exist."

"Each one must do the best for himself or herself," said Lady Scarsdale. "If Diana acknowledges the inevitable, as a sensible girl should and would do, it will be an excellent arrangement for her. With my introduction to society, she will find the world a very different one from that to which she has been accustomed. Without me she cannot obtain the entree to the highest and most select circles."

"Yet she is a lady, and certainly a great heiress!" said Evadne.

"She will be quite sure to find her level," observed Lady Scarsdale, calmly. "And now, my dear children, our conference is closed."

Household Notes.

Attach a two-inch piece of transparent gummed adhesive tape to the lower corners of sheet music instead of binding them back. This will prolong the life of the music.

For egg toast, take one cupful of milk, add a quarter of a teaspoonful of salt, beat the egg and add the liquid and salt. Soak the bread in this until soft and try to a light brown.

In making curtains the selvage should be cut off and the material turned in one-half inch and then the two-inch hem made. The curtains will then hang correctly and wear longer.

Ice cream croquettes are made by grinding a cupful of browned almonds; to these add a cupful of sifted macaroon crumbs, then dip in spoonfuls of frozen cream and roll each in the nuts.

LONDON, Oct. 1. While delegates of the transportation federation were assembling to-day to decide whether 325,000 workers represented should go out in sympathy with the striking railroad men, Great Britain, government officials report on the situation issued at noon announced a continued improvement in actual conditions. The train service had been bettered a commensurate, more than eight hundred trains having been run yesterday, exclusive of those in operation in a way service. Additional railroad cars have returned to work, it was declared. Arrangements have been made to replace bus men and tramway men should they strike, the statement announced. It was added that the movement of food was proceeding remarkably well. J. H. Thomas, railway men's leader, on entering the transport federation meeting said he would still using all his influence to settle the dispute to the original participants. Enormous crowds gathered outside Caxton Hall where the transport conference was being held. Whenever any of the delegates stepped themselves they were asked onlookers how proceedings were going. Most of the delegates who proached expressed opinion that conciliation was possible.

THE STRIKE SITUATION.

LONDON, Oct. 1. Organization of food and transport service by the government resumption of war time rationing has proved most effective and has worked smoothly. The Food Ministry announced that there is a general reserve of sufficient for two or three weeks and there is a plentiful supply of butter and margarine. The government made an earnest appeal to the people to observe the economy in coal, petrol and to avoid the use of automobiles for pleasure riding. If this appeal does not bring general response of private cars will be prohibited and petrol will be sold only on license. Horse racing has been suspended in England and Ireland because of the strike. While the majority of London morning newspapers continue to urge the necessity of the public supporting the government in fighting the strike to a finish and emphasize cheerfulness with which the country is bearing present inconveniences.
