By Henry James.

The other day, after her death, when they were discussing her, some one said, in reference to the great number of years she fed lived, the people she had seen, and the holding the seen and the stories are knew, "What a pity no one ever stories are knew, "What a pity no one ever stories are knew, "What a pity no one ever stories are knew, "What a pity no one ever stories are knew, "What a pity no one ever stories he knew, "What a pity no one ever stories he knew, "What a pity no one ever the subject presently changed. I had taken many notes, but I didn's mention it theu, and the see the see the see that I hence the see that the have preserved; it's not worse than the have preserved; it's not worse than the chers. among succession offers—so than the chers. I will give you some of the others of the world; she came up but once in five years. We had been together as young creatures, and then we give as girl; whe had dropped out of the world; she came up but once in five years. We had been together as young creatures, and then we give as young creatures, and then we give as a girl; who had one our ways. It was arranged between us that after I should have gid a criatin visit in August, in the west of England, I would take her—it would be very convenient, she was just over the Cornish border—on the way to my other engagements. I would work her in, as they say. She was ted immensely to show me her home, and she wanted still more to show me her girl, who had not come up to London, choosing instead, after much deliberation, tog abroad for a month with her brother and her brother's coach—he had been creaming for something—and Mrs. Coach, of course. All that Mrs. Chantry had been able to show me in town was her husband, one of those country gentlemen, with a moderate property and an old place, who are in the property and an old place, who are intensely local in their quarter of the county, and intensely "out of it" anywhere else. One day before my visit to Chantry Court, the people to whom I had gone from town took me over to see some friends of theirs, who lived ten miles away, in a place that was supposed to be fine. As it was a long drive, we stayed to luncheon, and then as there were gardens and other things that were more or less on show, we lingered on to tea, so as to get home just in time for dinner. There was a good many other people present, and before luncheon, a very i retty girl came into the drawing-room, a quite young thing, less than twenty, fresh and fair and charming, with the look of some one I knew. I asked who she was, and was told she was Miss Chantry, so that in a moment I spoke to her, mentioning that I w

Inc., young man who had "ridgen over," and another young man who was staying.

Louis Chantry sat opposite to me at the luncheen, but too far for conversation, and before we got up I had discovered that if ner manner to me had been odd, it was not because she was inanimate. She was, on the contrary, in a state of intense, although carefully muffiled vibration. There was something the matter with her; but no one perceived it; no one, that is, with an exception—an exception which was a part of the phenomenon itself. This single vivid consciousness waslodged in the breast of the young man whom I have aliuded to as staying in the house. He was on the same side of the table as myself, and diagonally facing the girl; therefore what I learned about him was, for the moment, mainly that she told me-meaning by "she" her face, her eyes, her movements, her whole perverted personality. She was extremely on her guard, and I should not have guessed her secret but for an accident. The accident was the only time she dropped her eyes upon him during the repast I happened to notice, but it led to my seeing that there was a little drama going on, of which he was the hero. It was natural that in this zapacity he should be the cause of my asking my left-hand neighbor, who happened abe my host, for some account of him. But "Oh, that fellow? He's my nephew," was a lescription which, to appear copious, needed hat I should know more about the uncle. We had coffee on the terrace of the house—a terrace laid out, in one quarter, oddly and charmingly in grass, where the servants who waited upon us seem to tread, processionally, on soundless velvet. There I had good look at my host's nephew, and a onger talk with my friend's daughter, in ogard to whom I had become conscious of faint, formless auxioty. I remember say oher, gropingly, instinctively: "My dear hild, can I do nothing for you? man Syrup for some trouble of the Throat and Lungs can hardly appreciate what a truly wonderful medicine it is. The delicious sensations of healing, easing, clear-ing, strength-gathering and recovering are unknown joys. For German Syrup we do not ask easy cases. Sugar and water may smooth a threat or stop a tickling—for a while. This is as far as the ordinary cough medicine goes. Boschee's German Syrup is a discovery, a great Throat and Lung Specialty. Where for years there have been sensitiveness, pain, coughing, spitting, hemorr-hage, voice failure, weakness, slipping down hill, where doctors and medicine and advice have been swallowed and followed to the gulf of despair, where there is the sickening conviction that all is over and the end is inevitable, there we place German Syrup. It cures. You are a live man yet if you take it.

The Circular Saw 22 years ago was as much a novelty and as dif-ficult to run as the Band Saw is to-day. With the experience gained in handling the Circular, knowledge of the Band Saw is much more readily acquired. Special ir proved tools also facilitate the work. We furnish an expert with each mill to instruct in the use of tools and work on saw.
