Mr. Chairman, Ladies and Gentlemen Mr. Cnairman, Ludies and Gentlemen,— I am sure you will believe me when I say that I feel not a little reluctance in recurring once more to the discussion of a subject upon which I have sooten spoken to you —the subject of tariff reform. It has been the theme for long discussions in Parliament and for frequent speeches upon the piatform during the past fifteen years. I dare eay it is a theme of which you have at times grown weary, and, when this is the case, speeches dealing with tariff reform are made to little profit; but the magnificent victory won in this direction by the supporters of a revenue tariff among our neighbors leads me to hope that the success of sound, economic views by them is cess of sound, economic views by them in not likely to be without its effect upo coss of sound, economic views by them is not likely to be without its eiect upon us. There are, too, indications here that the public mind is in a receptive mood, and that the people of Canada are prepared to consider seriously the propriety of tariff reform and of limiting the expense of government to the current resources of the country. I need not say to you that our expenditure has long been far beyond what the wealth and resources of this country warrant. Canada has reaped what it has sown, and the crop, however disappointing, is what thoughful men expected. When I look over this great country, for which Providence has done so much that is good, and those entrusted with authority have done so much that is evil, I am again impressed with the conviction that the path of public duty is a plain path, from which those entrusted with authority cannot deviate without detriment to the country. It is more than ever incumbent upon us to insist upon wrongs have been done which must be re-dressed, it is necessary to revert to the con-sideration of first principles, and to profit by the aid which they may give us in the solution of the problems with which we are called upon to deal. The present political situation imposes this duty upon us. Public evils of a very grave character must be dealt with. Public unrest, which may grow into dangerous discontent be dealt with. Public unrest, which may grow into dangerous discontent, must be allayed. No one who does not recognize the ffact is likely to exercise that care or give to the situation that consideration which it requires. It does not, however, need very long or very minute observation to discover that our whole individual civilization over its origin to the security which to discover that our whole individual civilization owes its origin to the security which the law gives to each individual that he shall enjoy the fruit of his own industry. (Applause.) If each of us clearly saw that what he by his toil produced was to become the property of another person without any advantage to himself, the principal stimulus to labor would be taken away; for everyone would see who was so despoiled that a species of servitude existed by which he was everyone would see who was so despoiled that a species of servitude existed by which he was

BOTH IMPOVERISHED AND WERONGED.
No doubt, if those who profited by his labors, and the Government which had become their instrument could conceal the consequences from his sight by an appeal to party prejudices, these results would not immediately follow. But experience and time would make the fact plain to him that while his labor was great his recompense was little, and then he would begin, if he did not before, to slacken in his exertions and to produce a great deal less than if his recompense were greater. And this would be all the more certain to happen because he would be impoverished both from diminished rewards and from weakened exertions. What is true of the individual must be true of the masses in the aggregate, and so we see what enormous loss the country annually sustains by the weakening of its energies when such a fiscal policy as that which obtains here is allowed to prevail. (Cheers.) The imposition of a very high tariff, not to secure the payment of revenue to the State upon foreign goods, but the payment of a revenue to the favored few upon goods produced at home, has been the practice of Parliament since the autumn of 1878, and the result has been as disastrous to Canada as the experience of mankind elsewhere led as to expect. Unfortunately for the country the Franchise Act, the Redistribution Act and the power usurped by Ministers in as the experience of managing ensured size us to expect. Unfortunately for the country the Franchise Act, the Redistribution Act and the power usurped by Ministers in the appointment of returning officers has in a large degree prevented a fair expression of public opinion. I have no doubt whatever that the public opinion, if it had been fairly obtained in 1887 and 1891, would on each occasion have been adverse to the Administration. I shall not, however, divert your attention from what I have mainly before me by a discussion of these matters. I think you will agree with me when I say that whenever men take counsel of their passions and prejudices instead of their passions and prejudices instead of their passions and prejudices instead of their reason and moral sense they are pretty sure to go wrong, and the people of Canada have, in this respect, had no better fortune than others who have done so before them. Is is interesting, though it is by no means pleasing, to observe the way in which this calamitous policy obtained a foothold, and how, when it once became established, it has been enabled to maintain itself to the GREAT DETRIBUNT OF THE COUNTRY.

I need not say to you that there is in the human mind an unreasoning, a combative element, with which the reason and the intellect are in frequent conflict wherever there is progress; and when men yield to this combative feeling and follow its bias they not only place themselves in antagonism to other States, but they do so to the lasting injury of vast numbers of their own countrymen. Writers on social and political science point out that among savages but few families combine together, because each family is of the opinion that it can
