are only two over there; but here the number seems to be legion. I've been up against them all, good and hard. There are almost as many as there are towns in this country, and I can tell with great feeling how much more favorable the American syndicates are for the advancement of the manager and the dissipation of his troubles than the ombinations here. In England the theatrical syndicates are made up of managers in the provinces, who dictate to the London nanagers how and under what conditions they will accept a metropolitan there are no hardships at all." "You spoke of two syndicates. Are there two?" "Of course, the second had to come. It was apparent from the time the first was formed. I myself once thought of forming an extra syndi-cate, because I felt certain there was room for a competitor in any business proposition that is successful.

"If I should like the new syndicate I might place some of my extra at-tractions with it, but," said Mr. Frohman, with a sort of chuckle, "I think should really prefer a third."

"Will there be a third?"
"It is bound to come," replied Mr. Frohman. "It is only a matter of the number of theaters."
