From the New York Commercial Advertiser. When the heart of a man is filled with remorse for his faults it sometimes takes a very little thing to fill his cup of bitter ness to overflowing. This happened, it appears, in the case of a switchman, Willis A. Kane by name, lately employed on the Nangatuck railroad. Through his carelessness a train was derailed and he was diamissed from his employment with the superintendent's mild condemnation, "You ought to be more careful." These simple words so rankled in the breast of the man that he soon imagined every body dinning them at him. In this morbid state a few days ago he accidentally broke a plate. His wife rebuked him, unwittingly using the same tateful werds that had been hannting him so long. This proved to be Kane's death-knell.
