A declara-tion of war between two such populous tion of war between two such populous nations is now a matter of world-wide im-portance, and the conflict will be eagerly portance, and the conflict will be eagerly watched by the civilized world. A war between these two nations now will not prove the struggle between two half-civilized people such an event would have been a few years ago. Within the last quarter of a century both these nations have made marked improvements in the arts of war. Both have large armies fairly well equip ped, and not altogether ignorant of modern military tactics. This is particularly true military tactics. This is particularly true We are in receipt of the Demo of Japan, both as regards army and navy.

The immediate bone of contention in the present fight is the peninsula of Corea, on the extreme eastern coast of Asia, over which both China and Japan claim to have some authority- Both, it seems, have treaties giving them the right to land troops at Cor-ea, in order to quell disturbances, when they occur.
