[28]

" To you, Sirs, and your honours, Ibe-

Form it, fashion it, as you please; but do not cut the babe in twain; leave it that vital principle; that spirit which alone can make it an honour to its parent, or an advantage to the publick.

There remains now but one confideration more, though that a most important one; namely, what hopes we have any reasonable ground to form of its fuccess: And here, Sir, 1 know the many difficulties the fubject labours under, and how many adverse opinions I have to struggle with: fome are for no terms, no offers at all: fome will think them too large: some are for withdrawing the troops, and some for giving absolute independence. I know besides the difficulty of obtaining any peace in our prefent fituation; but I beg the House to recollect that if the difficulty is great, the prize is ineftimable.

As to withdrawing the troops, or granting independence, I shall fay little. The former