

RESIDENCE.

For the accomplishment of the delicate and important work collegiate residence is most desirable, if not absolutely necessary. Consequently, Trinity makes Residential Colleges (for students of both sexes) one of its special features. Its colleges are a carefully studied Canadian adaptation of those grand old colleges of Oxford and Cambridge which have exerted so marked an influence upon the English national character for centuries, and it is not unreasonable to hope that Trinity's Residential Colleges will exert a corresponding influence upon the Canadian character.

RELIGIOUS TEACHING AND INFLUENCE.

Another necessary foundation to the building up of character of worth and permanence is proper care for the moral and spiritual welfare of the students, in order that this side of their character may enjoy healthy growth concurrently with bodily development and the training of the mental faculties. Thus, by due and proportionate attention to the several faculties of man's varied nature together with that development of the social side of his character which, happily, is one of the incidental advantages of the common life of residential colleges, the student enjoys during his college career the harmonious development of all sides of his complex nature.

THE OPEN DOOR.

Till the new movement inaugurated two years ago, all Trinity students necessarily came under the doctrinal teaching of the Church of England; but by the regulations now in force students of all denominations are accorded equal rights with those of the Church of England, and are given the fullest liberty to enjoy the advantages of Trinity's residential system and the general influences of the University, without any interference with their individual liberty in regard to doctrinal teaching and forms of religious worship. For Church of England students the regulations remain as before, so that all such students, now as heretofore, receive careful instruction in the doctrines of their own Church.
