

The Braes of Yarrow

An Historical Tale of the Sixteenth Century.

To gallants she proffered doublets or hose with a comely smile which, as her face was not ill-favoured, although her voice was somewhat of the swan kind, had its effect; to the ladies she proffered gowns and hoods and kirtles, with a curtsy and a word of flattery which was also effective in pushing traffic. All this time Sandie, a little wry man, sat on his board within the shop in the midst of his apprentices, stitching and watching the progress of his helpmate, chuckling no doubt, at her success, notwithstanding her vanity.

"Would ye deal the day, maister, queried the dame, with her most attractive smile, as Gilbert halted. "We have brave silken doublets that would become a fine gentleman like ye, and silken hose to match. I trow, guid as any that ever came frae France, or may be ye would like."

Gilbert interrupted her in the catalogue which he knew she was about to supply of the various articles at his command.

"Nay dame, I seek only a cloak and bonnet of simple stuff."

"And that ye shall hae, maister, better than ye'll get any whar else in the Luckenbooths, or in Edinbro' for the matter o' that."

Gilbert entered the shop and speedily procured the articles he required, but much to the dame's chagrin, he chose the plainest bonnet he could find, and refused to have a feather of any kind in it. She was mollified by a free gift of the beaver he had been wearing.

A few doors further on he found an armourer's, where he procured a poignard and a brace of petronels. Having secured these in his belt, he quitted the Luckenbooths and entered the Grassmarket. Then slowly turned back to the Cross.

The fog was thickening, and, as a drizzly rain began to fall, the omen of the approaching storm seemed likely to be fulfilled. Gilbert curbed his impatience sufficiently to remain quietly in the hostelry till the hour he had appointed for the rescue arrived.

With the first stroke of the vesper bells he was at the porch of St. Cuthbert's and standing in the light which proceeded from the open door, so that he might be readily recognized by her for whom he waited. His cloak, however, was drawn carefully around him, and the bonnet well over his brow, so that the good folks who were passing into prayers might not desert his features. It was not without certain palpitations of hope that she might come and fear that she would not, but might deem his proffered service an unwarrantable piece of presumption, that he prepared to wait, for he did not expect her to arrive until the bells had done tolling, and the place would be comparatively deserted. In this, however, presently he had cause to think himself mistaken. Only twelve people had entered the chapel. The thirteenth was a female form muffled in hood and cloak, and with face screened by a thick veil. His pulse quickened as the figure, moving slowly by him, whispered tremulously, and as if half doubtful if he were the right person.

"Winter has come."

"And the bird flies," he responded quickly in an undertone.

Follow me.

He passed out of the porch, and the veiled lady, in obedience to his direction followed. When they were beyond the radius of the chapel lights, the evening being quite dark, Gilbert paused and took his companion by the hand.

"I must lead your ladyship now," he said earnestly; "but be of good cheer, we shall be beyond the reach of our enemies."

The lady seemed to be too much agitated to make any reply, and in silence he conducted her to where the ostler of the St. Andrew's Rect, faithful to his promise, awaited with the horses. Still in silence, Mistress Douglas was assisted to the saddle. An instant afterwards, Gilbert had also mounted, and the horses' heads were turned northward.

KERN REJOINDER.—The Paris Patrie, official organ of Napoleon, sneeringly alluded to the circumstances of the witty Provost Paradol having accompanied the Queen of Spain in her flight "doubtless in order to witness the collapse of a dynasty." To this M. Paradol replies that it was only by chance he happened to be present when the Queen arrived at the Biarritz Railway Station; and then touches his imperial adversary thus:—"As to the overthrow of a dynasty, you are no doubt aware that it is a right afforded Parisians often enough, without their leaving France to seek it; and permit me to add that you and your friends neglect nothing in order that the present generation may not be more deprived than its predecessors."

THE TORONTO COUNCIL AND THE RAILWAYS.—The "Telegraph" says that there is a doubt expressed, whether the City Council, at its next meeting, will take any decided action on the railway subsidy measure. Certain of the members are said to hold back their votes in view of the majority election. Others are said to be shaping their course from more questionable motives.
