The Story of a Life's Love.

(By Stuart Livingston, Barrister, Hamilton, "They telegraphed for me, and when I arrived she was still unconscious. I remained with her through all the long days and nights of fever and delirium that followed, and through it all, even when the fever was at the highest, she never ceased to call your name. Oh, Paul, I never heard such agony in human voice."

"At this point my aunt's feelings overcame her, and she ceased speaking.
"When she had at length become calmer,
she continued:
"I'remember well the night they said she would die. I sat beside her bed; it was nearly midnight, and they said she could not live till morning. She slowly opened her great blue eyes and looked up into mine. Her lips moved and I reached over to catch the sound.
"i"Auntie, she whispered, 'they say I will die before morning, don't they?"
"'Hush, dear."

'Hush, dear.' "'Auntie, promise me something."
"'Anything, dear; but you must not

"Anything, dear; but you must hak!
"It was only a breath this time.
"Auntie, if I die and Paul recovers, will you tell him that I loved him most?
"Yes, dear,' I whispered, and with a little sigh she slowly closed her eyes again.
"I thought she was dead, but she only

When her tather took her with this London in the summer, he did so with the intention that she should become engaged to an elderly but wealthy acquaintance of to an elderly but wealthy acquaintance of his, and shortly after arriving home he informed her of his wishes. She refused to comply, and when this Mr. Moreland proposed to her he was rejected. This angered her father greatly. He argued and expostulated by turns, telling her he must have the money to go abroad, as it was his last hope for life, and still she resolutely refused to do what she knew to be wrong. He then asked her reasons, and she told him simply of her love for you, and how she could never love or marry anyone else. He tried and her out of it, but all to no purpose, she remained true to the instincts of her womanhood.

"And a so the time wore "on, and she below is not all thorns. You strike a nettle once in a while.

"She never spoke once of her own suffering, Paul, during all the time she was relating this to me, but when she told me what follows, her face, even in the memory of it, became as white as it was upon that awful night when she lay so near to death.

"One day her father's cough troubled him much more than usual, and his condition at length became so serious that the attending physician thought it best to call in another in consultation. Winnie was present when the result was made known, and heard them tell her father that unless he immediately left for the south of France he could not live three months, but if he left at once they both thought there might still be hope.

"That evening Mr. Moreland renewed his proposal, and offered, if accepted, to at once advance the money necessary to enable

"When she had told me all this, Paul, she was silent for some moments, and then added slowly:
"He was my father, Aunt Hilda, and if it were all'to do over again I would do it just as I did, yes, I would do it all, if God would help me as he did before.'
"You remainer, Paul, what I once told you about Winnie's religion; well, there is only one short chapter more to add to our story. After she had employed some of the best physicians to examine your case, and they had all given it as their opinion that you would probably never regain your for Catalogue."

only one thing, is she alive or—or dead?

"She is dead to you, Paul; she is in the town of St. Par, in Southern France, at the convent of the Holy Sisters—she is a nun.

"I think I gave you last evening, my friend, a history of the few more important events that occurred during my first year in the village of St. Par. If I did I must have mentioned the good brothers Barsad, in whose employ I was during the greater part of my sojourn there. Did I not speak to you, my friend, of the good brothers?"

I made no reply as I found it was never wise to differ from him in anything which he might say. He had such a firm belief in the certainty of his powers of recollection the certainty of his powers of recollection that upon several occasions my drawing his attention to inaccuracies of this nature had led us into argument. Indeed, once when this happened he had refused during the remainder of the evening to again speak of his history, and that notwithstanding I had consented to admit I was in error. He seemed not to notice my silence, however, and continued:

had consented to admit I was in error. He seemed not to notice my silence, however, and continued:

"Ah, my friend, the villagers were not mistaken when they called the brothers good. It had not until then been my good fortune to meet two such venerable and saintly old men, nor have I ever since seen their like. They were, in truth, as I have said, far advanced in years, both of them having watched the varying changes of over three-quarter of a century, and it was related of them in the village, that during the whole of that time there had never been a falling out between them. After I had lived for some time in the home of the brothers, I found no difficulty in believing this to be true. I do not recollect ever seeing the one sit down to a meal until the other was first present. I will remember one evening coming in late from the fields, and finding Suger sitting, as was his custom, in the little yard before the honse, and seeing that the table was already prepared for our simple meal, I showed some signs of impatience at being obliged to wait, for I was very hungry. The grave old man turned toward me and slowly said:

"Be seated at the table, my son, and begin to eat; it is not well that young hunger should remain longer unsatisfied."

"I replied, 'will you not be seated, Father Suger, it is now so long since the noon hour?"

"No, my son,' he said, 'I will await my brother's coming, I do not care to eat until the food first has his blessing."

"It may seem strange to you my friend, that he should call me son, seeing that I also appeared well advanced in years, but you would not deem it so if you had seen him. There were few in the village who remembered ever hearing him called by any other name than that of Father Suger, and, indeed, my friend, the benignity of his countenance would have commanded that reverent address from one to whom the story of his godly life was wholly unknown.

"But to me, my friend, he became more than a father in mere mode of formal address; ah, yes, much more than that. How often aft dress; ah, yes, much more than that. How often after returning from labor have I thrown myself down upon the grass at his feet, and felt encouraged and strengthened by his wise and kindly words. And, ah, my friend, how often upon those occasions have I sorrowed secretely, for it was only then that I fully realized how great a loss I had been mine when my father was taken from me during the unknowing days of my schildhood. Readers of the Western Advertiser | The Waste of Manure.

Readers of the Western Advertiser | Will recognize that the above is no fancy sketch. It is a picture of a barn yard from "real life." There are thousands just like it in Canada. It shows how manure is wasted—hundreds of thousands of dollars worth every year. But still the owner stands idly by or wades through that yard half way up to his boot tops looking at the big round dollars running to waste with every shower of rain. Commencing in the fall the farmer forks the manure out of the windows under the eaves, leaving it there to leach and rot the side of his stable all winter long, and then next spring or summer he drags the "mortal remains" to the field and hopes to grow big crops.
