these diversions, whether it is the Liberal convention or the federal-provincial conference, to prevent the government from getting ahead with its program. I simply wish to say to my right hon. friend that he made a very powerful speech today in defence of freedom, as he always does. I suggest that this is an occasion when I think he has given a definition of freedom which is not implicit in the Bill of Rights. The Bill of Rights never for a moment assumed that in situations such as this there is a violation of Magna Carta or habeas corpus or of the Bill of Rights. Surely the great and noble sentiments that moved my hon. friend to bring in the Bill of Rights were not involved in the little grievance of the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that you have taken your position respecting, as you must, the rights of an individual member and expressing your doubts about the full projection of those rights. Now it is our responsibility to determine whether or not the time of this house or of its committees should be wasted. I suggest it is clear that this house has already indicated in no uncertain manner that this motion must be turned down.

The house divided on the motion (Mr. Nugent) which was negatived on the following division:
