A brakeman had a very narrow escape. He fortunately went forward to inquire as to the reason why the train had been stopped at Parson's. Had he not done so he would have been among the cars which were wrecked.

The train was moving at an easy rate, it is reported, as it had been flaged at Parson's, and was just getting well under this side of Parson's bridge, and before the high embankment near the Four-Mile. The train hands estimate that the train

Fortunately the derailed cars were piled in such a way as to facilitate the building of the line around them without removing all the debris. The accident took place on a curve. The first two cars were derailed just where the road was resuming a straight line again. These cars offered the greatest obstacle. Their contents were emptied and transferred to other cars, and then the cars were pulled out of the way.

All the other cars were tumbled over goods. Among the consignees represented in the lot are Lenz & Leiser and G.
