Much has been made of the fact that the recently adopted Antipodean policy provides for the automatic placing of the fleet under the direct control of the British Admirality in time of war. The Australian plan does not provide for this, but for such transference to be made by the Australian authorities. There is not so much difference in the plan after all. If war broke out, the British Government would communicate direct with the Government of New Zealand before a ship left New Zealand before a ship left. New Zealand before a ship left New Zealand betone thing would be done in the case of Australia. In each case the British Government would wire its reasons and state the case to the Colonial authorities, and most time would be lost in preparing and sending the ships to whatever quarter desired.
