CHAPTER X.—CONTINUED. Three days passed, and nothing curred out of the ordinary routine of when he was almost at his journey's end barrack life. Lane gradually became a terrible misfortune befell him. He re-assured as to the consequences of discovered that he had lost his pockethis adventure, and went to give his book containing all his uncle's letters. safe on the previous day. Whether it had dropped from his pocket among the straw upon which he slept, whether it had dropped from his pocket among the straw upon which he slept, whether it had fallen on the road when he ran atter a passing vehicle in the hope of a lift for a few miles, he could not tell. The poor boy shed as many tears as he had walked miles, but he never slacken unusually large characters, and darkness seemed to come over him. He remained motionless for two minutes, his hand before his eyes, which he thought must have deceived him. Then he took courage. "No, it is impossible," he said, in a decided tone: "it would believe him, and together they might persuade the magistrates to act. He arrived at Frankfort on the anniversary of the day on which Lib

Continue their patronage.

Lane did not read the last lines, the other portion was enough for him!

Unconsciously he arose from the chair, mechanically he took up the hat which he had laid down, pressed it over his brow, and staggered out of the room and out of the house, without being seen by any one. The farther he went to faster he walked—he soon left the town behind him.

He went away, and walked slowly up and down before the house, longing to twent away, and Lena, Wimmer's daughter,

"When will she return?" asked bertram:

"It is impossible to say."

The clerks, who were all unknown to him, looked so ill-tempered and sullen, that Bertram did not venture to ask further, fearing that his questions might awaken suspicion, and cause them to call Blitterman.
