

The necessity of external goods is what anchors Aristotle to the state. The best moral life must have an economic basis.

But the Stoics maintained that material goods were not necessary to the ideal life, not only the master but the slaves. One with such a view wouldn't care for material goods or economic reflection. And so we pass away from contemplation of economics.
Christianity