A FOX AND A VIXEN.
A Follower of the Hounds Tells a Strange Story of Animal Devotion.

I had attended the meet of the Surrey Union Foxhounds at Burford Bridge Hotel at 11 a. m. (on Boxing Day), and after following them until 12.15 started to cycle home for lunch. When some two miles from Rammore Church I struck a small road leading toward Effingham village, and at once decided to ride that way in the hope of seeing hounds again.

This narrow road winds through a small wood, upon entering which I heard view halloo and hounds in full cry some distance to windward. I determined to wait here, as the spot seemed a likely one, and propping my machine against a tree, took careful cover.

After some few minutes a stealthy movement in the leafy woodland drew my attention, and within five yards of me there passed a dog fox, evidently hunted and dead tired. He paused in the roadway some fifteen yards in front of where I stood, when to my surprise the vixen turned back deliberately in their tracks for about fifteen yards, crossing and recrossing, in order, I suppose, to make the scent as strong as possible on her own line. She then returned to where she had left her husband (I presume he must have been her husband, as there seemed to be such a perfect understanding between them), and on reaching that point made off in the opposite direction.

I eagerly waited for the hounds to come up, which they did in a few minutes. Three of them seemed doubtful, but after a momentary pause appeared convinced that the new trail was the right one, and all departed after the lady with fresh zest and much music. I fancy some must have been her husband, as there seemed to be such a perfect understanding between them, and on reaching that point made off in the opposite direction.

A "HEROM."

PUPILS' ESSAYS ON FIRE PRAISE "BRAVE" TEACHER.

"We Where All Quiet"--Chicago Children Tell What They Saw From Classroom Window.

Chicago, Feb. 13--In the estimation of her pupils, Miss Helen McLaren, a teacher at the Rogers school, is a "herom," whatever that may be.

Half a hundred children in the second grade yesterday turned in essays on a fire which had occurred in a butcher shop near the school.

Miss McLaren speaks modestly of her efforts to avert stampede, which undoubtedly would have resulted seriously. But the other teachers give her unstinted praise.

When one of the children called her attention to smoke from the fire, Miss McLaren had to think quickly. "Children," she said, "you may all stand up and look out this window. Now, don't get frightened, because there isn't any danger. If any one shouts 'fire' he'll have to sit down and then he won't see the engines."

So the pupils watched the blaze quietly from the windows. Instead of being frightened they enjoyed the spectacle. Then they had a language lesson on the fire.

"Isadore Koskoff," said Miss McLaren, "what do you see?"

"I see a great big smoke and a man on top of the roof with a pan of water," Isadore's reply. "He spilled the water on the fire. On the sidewalk in front of the Kosher they are two boxes with geese and ducks. I guess they know the Kosher is on fire."

"That's good," was the teacher's comment. "You will get 100 for language. Now, Sadie Adolph, what do you see?"

"Please, teacher," she said, "I see the fire, and it looks like it won't be much. The smoke is coming out of the roof. That's all I can think of to say about it."

A dozen other children were called upon to tell what they saw. Then, fearing that the other teachers, who were ignorant of the fire, would let the younger children out at 11.15 o'clock, as usual, Miss McLaren ran from room to room, whispering the alarm to the teacher in charge.

Miss McLaren found her class behaving admirably, and after giving the pupils instructions to write a story about the young children were dismissed.

From the fifty-four essays submitted Miss McLaren gave The Tribune those which she said were the best. One boy described the fire in this way: "There was a big fire. The fireman has work all day. We saw the fire. The point of the house was burning. A man came up with a pan of water. He spilled a pan of water. The house was very old. Miss McLaren was the herom. She went in all the rooms and told the Teshr. She was a good herom."

Another boy wrote: "There was a fire by the school. The fire engines came. Then the man took a pan of water and sprinkled it upon the fire. The smoke and flames were coming out. My teacher was brave. She went to each room and said to the teachers: 'Don't let your children go home because there is a fire next door.' Then they did not let their children go home."

One little girl labored over her effort
