What self importance and conceet, as if his recollection of us and our doings were of importance to any body. As a matter of fact we had been in the country almost eight years at the time of the educational and Church of England circles. But what has that got to do with the charge that the Evening Telegram was on the fence a not-able time after the Government had disclosed the terms of the Reid 1898 Deal. Our answer choked him, and well it might. It did not depend on the recollection of ourselves or of anybody else, it was based on the sure record of time and place and contemporaneous printed records. We quoted the journals of the House and showed that the Reid Contract was tabled on the evening of February 22nd, 1898, and that in the issue of that same evening, the Evening Telegram declared war on the Deal in no thing inconsistent in that? The Evening Telegram however never did approve of the outrageous terms of the 1898 Deal and promptly took a lead in opposing the sell-out.

But there was more than mere inconsistency on the part of the Evening Herald, McGrath and others who had gone to the country pledged to no further concessions to Reid and who immediately after the Elections set to work to negotiate that notorious sell-out to the late R. G. Reid. That was treachery pure and simple. That was fooling the electorate. That was an outrage of a magnitude that has seldom been known in parliamentary circles.
